

PROCEEDINGS

DECCAN HISTORY CONFERENCE

FIRST (HYDERABAD) SESSION

FOREWORD.

I have great pleasure in presenting the Proceedings of the First Session of the Deccan History Conference which was held in April, 1945 under the patronage of H E H. the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar

The delay in publication of the Proceedings was mainly due to the fact that in spite of all our efforts, the Press failed to realise the need of performing their work within the allotted time, and also due to the shortage of printing paper in the market

I desire to express my heart felt thanks and indebtedness to the Government of H. E. H. the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar and to Nawab Ali Yaver Jung Bahadur, Constitutional and Medical Member, H E. H. the Nizam's Government, to whose kindly interest and encouragement the success of the Conference was in no small measure due.

Deccan History Conference

(FIRST SESSION)

Hyderabad-Dn.

PRELIMINARY PREPARATIONS

Scholars and others interested in the study of Deccan History, from Hyderabad as well as other parts of India, had been suggesting for sometime the need of organising periodical Conferences which would serve as a centre for Deccan History research. On the invitation of the Idara-e-Adabiyat-e-Urdu, a small gathering of scholars, under the Presidentship of Nawab Ali Yavar Jung, met on 30th April, 1944, to explore the possibility of inaugurating a Deccan History Conference on an all-India basis. Thanks to the wide and tactful guidance of Nawab Ali Yavar Jung and for the warm personal interest he displayed from the very beginning, the idea of the Conference assumed a definite shape. It was resolved that the following bodies should combine to hold under its auspices the first Session of the Conference at Hyderabad sometime in April, 1945.

- 1 The Idara-e-Adabiyat-e-Urdu
- 2 The Department of History, Osmania University
- 3 The Hyderabad Archaeological Department
- 4 The Daftar-i-Divani (Records Office), Hyderabad.
- 5 The Archaeological and Historical Society, Hyderabad.
- 6 The Bazm-e-Tarikh, Osmania University
- 7 The Department of History, Nizam College
- 8 The History Association, Nizam College

The informal Committee originally formed was with a few additions, turned into a Working Committee for purposes of the Conference, it was also entrusted with the duty of coordinating the activities of various sub-Committees which might function under its guidance and of being the executive body of the future Reception Committee of the Conference. The proposal to hold a Deccan History Conference led to another idea. Nawab Inayat Jung Bahadur expressed the fear that a Conference held once in two years and held in different parts of India might make the organisation too fluid. Nawab Ali Yavar Jung Bahadur, while presiding over the Working Committee held on 19th November, 1944, suggested the establishment of a permanent Association in Hyderabad which should have the holding of a Conference as only one of its objects and which could meet more often than the Conference itself. This would widen the scope of the Conference and give it a firmer footing. The Association would become the nucleus of an organisation which would foster the cause of research in Deccan history and culture, and would be able to bring together all those individual workers who were devoting themselves to Deccan history into a coherent and effective body. This suggestion was welcomed by Nawab Inayat Jung Bahadur and others and a new orientation was thus given to the whole scheme of future work.

According to a resolution of the Working Committee, a memorial was submitted to His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar to honour the Association and the Conference by becoming the Patron of both, and His Exalted Highness was graciously pleased to accept the request. Nawab Sir Ahmad Said Khan of Chhatar, K C S I, K C I E, M.B.E., President of the Executive Council, H E H, the Nizam's Government was requested to become the Vice-Patron of the Association and the Conference.

A circular and two Bulletins were issued by the General Secretary to all Universities, Research Societies, Record Offices, Museums, Degree Colleges and teachers of history all over India, as well as to all scholars known to have an interest in any aspect of Deccan history and culture, inviting their participation in the Conference

Arrangements for Boarding and Lodging of the delegates were made in one of the Osmania University Hostels and, by courtesy of Government, in the State Guest House. There was provision for North Indian and South Indian (vegetarian and non-vegetarian) food for the Members and Delegates. Special cars, including one State Car, were made available for their use. Free conveyance was also supplied for the excursions to Kondapur, Golconda and the City. The State Rationing Board sanctioned extra petrol rations for the office-bearers as well as for the cars requisitioned for the Members and Delegates.

INAUGURAL CEREMONY, 10TH APRIL, 1945.

The Inaugural Meeting of the Deccan History Conference was held at the Arts College, Osmania University, on Tuesday, 10th April, 1945, at 5-30 p.m. In the unavoidable absence of Nawab Sir Ahmad Said Khan of Chhattani, President H.E.H. the Nizam's Executive Council, Nawab Sir Mahdi Yar Jung Bahadur, ex-Education Member, H.E.H. the Nizam's Government, delivered the Inaugural Address and declared open the First Session of the Conference in the presence of a select and distinguished gathering of ladies and gentlemen.

Nawab Ali Yavaj Jung Bahadur, Chairman, Reception Committee and Vice-Chancellor, Osmania University, introduced the President, the Sectional Presidents and Delegates to Nawab Sir Mahdi Yar Jung, after which a group photograph was taken.

The proceedings then commenced with the Inaugural Address. Nawab Sir Mahdi Yar Jung Bahadur delivered, at the outset, the gracious Message received from His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar, the Patron of the Association and the Conference which read as follows —

"I wish to congratulate the different bodies and individuals who have collectively organised the Deccan History Conference and the Deccan History Association. I also extend a hearty welcome to those outside scholars who have come to the capital of my Dominions for attending the first Session of the Conference.

"In the wide perspective of the History of India the History of the Deccan provides a study in miniature of the History of India itself, of different races and cultures, and their indelible impress on the different developments that have taken place in the course of the ages. The integration of these different factors with the History of India as a whole, by a process of specialisation and synthesis, is likely to provide an interesting approach to the study of that inter-play of forces in the north and in the south which determined the course of history. Such study would not be of purely academic interest if it is made to embrace the important aspects of the life of the people at different epochs, rather than being confined to the chronology of wars or of the rise and fall of dynasties. Such a wide view of history would assist the practical application of historical knowledge to many present problems which confront the administrator or the sociologist.

"My Government is keenly interested in all these efforts and is engaging itself, through the University, the Daftar-i-Divani and the Archaeological Department, as well as by grants to learned bodies and individual scholars, in promoting the above ends. It would welcome the cooperation in all these activities, as in the compilation of the History of the Deccan, a work recently undertaken, of those outside scholars who evince an interest in the History of the Deccan. The Conference and the Association both provide an ample and welcome forum for attaining that cooperation and for imparting to it an organic and practical shape.

"I shall be closely interested in the progress of your deliberations and shall watch your efforts in the direction of sustaining and advancing the aims and interests of the Conference and the Association with profound sympathy."

In the course of his Inaugural Address, Nawab Sir Mahdi Yari Jung stressed the importance of the history of the Deccan and the imperative need for viewing history without bias and from an objective point of view.

Nawab Ali Yavai Jung then delivered his Reception Address and explained the aims and scope of the Deccan History Conference and Association. He referred to the different activities connected with Deccan History which had been undertaken by the Osmania University, the Archaeological Department and the Daftar-i-Divani during the past two years. He said that the scheme for a comprehensive History of the Deccan had progressed satisfactorily. A scheme of preservation of pre-historic sites had been undertaken by the Archaeological Department, to which had recently been attached an Advisory Board with the object of co-ordinating the efforts of that Department, the University and other learned bodies and individuals in all the wide and varied fields of Archaeology. The work of classification, editing and publication of historical records in the Daftar-i-Divani was soon to be undertaken and a start had already been made in the direction of 'calendaring' the Persian and Marathi documents.

After the Reception Address, Mr. W V Grigson, President of the Conference and Member for Revenue, Supply and Police, H E.H. the Nizam's Government, delivered his Presidential Address in the course of which he welcomed the modern generation of trained Indian scholars which was taking up the work of scientific research in the history of different parts of the country. This kind of work called for a vast degree of specialisation and for the stimulation of local patriotism and local pride in the recording of the history of each locality. Mr Grigson gave a bird's-eye view of the History of the Deccan from accounts by different travellers and contemporary writers, selections from whose writings he was engaged in compiling as an anthology. He quoted from the writings of Ralph Fitch, Anthony Schafer, William Methwold, Tavernier, Pieter de Lange, Bernier and Niccolao Manucci who had visited the country in the seventeenth century and had given a vivid picture not only of the pomp and ceremony of the great and rich but of the condition of the poor and lowly. Among later writers he quoted interesting anecdotes from the works of Wolseley Haig, John Malcolm and Mountstuart Elphinstone.

The General Secretary then read out the following messages of good wishes received by the President, Reception Committee

His Excellency the Governor of Madras :—

"It is with great pleasure that I send a message of goodwill to the first Session of the Deccan History Conference.

The study of history can contribute much to the well-being of mankind by helping races and nations to understand the past and by this experience to avoid the same pitfalls in the future

I hope that this first session will be a profitable one followed by many others in the years to come. I have much pleasure in sending my best wishes for its success."

His Excellency the Governor of the Central Provinces and Berar :—

His Highness the Maharajah of Baroda :—

"I hope the Deccan History Conference will stimulate researches necessary for re-writing Indian History and I wish the first Session all success."

His Highness the Nawab of Rampur :—

"I send my hearty felicitations to the first Deccan History Conference and hope that under His Exalted Highness' patronage it will quicken interest in the great contribution of Deccan to the various aspects of Indian History."

His Highness the Ruler of Sandur :—

"I heartily wish the first Session of the Deccan History Conference all success

A scientific study of the History of the South is no less important than that of the North for a full understanding of the past of India as a whole. The South has played a conspicuous part in the political, cultural and religious life of the people in no way inferior to the part played by the North. The Dravidian culture, the Hindu Kingdoms of Chera, Chola, Kerala and Pandya and others that were set up on the extinction of these, the Bahmani Kingdom, the Vijayanagar Empire, the Empire of the Marathas which beginning in the South spread as far as Attock in the North, the three great Acharyas whose systems of philosophy have spread even to the North offer a fertile field for research to students of Indian History. The Ghoisades in the Karnatak and the Nizams in Hyderabad have many achievements to their credit. Sporadic attempts have been made by individual historians to a certain extent. Wilk's 'History of Mysore,' Sewell's 'Forgotten Empire,' Gribble's 'History of the Deccan' may be cited as examples. If work of this nature is done in collaboration the results are likely to be even better. Conferences, where historians meet, where papers are read and discussed, serve a very useful purpose in coordinating work. Hyderabad deserves to be congratulated on taking the initiative in the matter and holding the first session of the Deccan History Conference. Under the kind patronage of His Exalted Highness the Nizam, one may expect an exhaustive and an authoritative History of the Deccan to be written and published at no distant date."

His Highness the Nawab Ruler of Bhopal :—

"Wish all success to Deccan History Conference in the great aims and objects to achieve which it has been inaugurated."

His Highness the Raja Saheb of Sangli :—

"I welcome the formation of Deccan History Association and first Session of the Deccan History Conference at Hyderabad. Congratulate the Association and the Conference on support and patronage vouchsafed to them by His Exalted Highness and wish the success in promoting and encouraging scientific study of Deccan History."

Sri Raghubir Singhji, Heir-Apparent of Sitamai State :—

"I am looking forward to the great historical drive in the Deccan, which will start with the first History Conference and will gain momentum year by year. It shall ever be a pleasure to do my bit in that great cause."

RESIDENT AND MINISTERS.

Sir Arthur Lothian, Resident at Hyderabad :—

"I congratulate the various bodies concerned on their decision to form a Deccan History Association and to hold a Deccan History Conference on the tenth of this month. Few areas in the world contain more interesting historical remains than the Deccan and nothing could be more desirable than the stimulation of local interest in their study. I have every hope, therefore, that the Conference under the wise guidance of Mr. Gimson will be a great success and I trust it will be the forerunner of many others to come."

Sir Sultan Ahmad, Member for Information Broadcasting, Govt. of India :—

"Best wishes for the success of your Conference. I am sure its deliberations will lead to fruitful results in the interest of the country."

Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer, Diwan of Travancore :—

"I send my cordial good wishes to the Deccan History Conference and wish it all success."

Sir Mirza Ismail, Diwan Jaipur —

"Best wishes for successful Conference, encouraging constant cooperation in research and scholarship. I hope that it will produce authoritative work on Deccan History which affords such a wonderful field for discovery and interpretations."

Sir B. L. Mitter, Diwan of Baroda —

"Indian History has to be re-written by Indian scholars. In that history Deccan must occupy a most prominent place. It is in the fitness of things that the promotion and encouragement of a scientific study of Deccan history should be initiated by means of a Conference in the capital of the State of Hyderabad. Scholarship has no narrow barriers and it is hoped that those engaged in a scientific study of Deccan History will be inspired by the true spirit of research and the result of their endeavours will be crowned with success. Hyderabad has preserved Indian culture in a remarkable measure and may Hyderabad lead the way to the preparation of a comprehensive history of India as a whole."

Sir Joseph Bhore, Adviser to H.H. the Nawab Ruler of Bhopal —

"Wish Deccan History Conference successful inaugural meeting. May its work now and in the future enrich the store of the History and culture of this part of our country and promote fruitful scientific study of the subject. It seems fitting that as in so many other fields an Indian State should take the leading part in promoting cultural research of this nature."

Mr. R. S. Panchmukhi, Dharwar —

“Wish success Deccan History Conference”

Mr. Zaidi, Divan Rampur State —

‘Wish the Deccan History Conference all success May it awaken genuine interest in social, cultural and political problems”

VICE-CHANCELLORS OF INDIAN UNIVERSITIES.

Dr. A. L. Mudaliar, Vice-Chancellor, Madras University —

“It is a matter for sincere congratulation that the First Deccan History Conference is being organised under the auspices of your University. I feel sure that the Conference will be a great success and that it will help in stimulating interest in the study of the History of Deccan from the cultural, social and political point of view

The History of Deccan links up the relations with North India and South India, and it is becoming increasingly clear that research in the history of South India will throw a flood of light on many problems which are still very much in the dark in connection with the ancient history of India. The history of Deccan will, therefore, be a most useful method of approaching the history of the two great ancient civilisations of India and to lay bare many facts which will help to a more just appreciation of the language, of the social habits and the cultural trends and of the ancient monuments of the people of Deccan and South India. Recent excavations have already yielded results of such importance to scholars of Deccan history that I feel that a Conference of this nature will be a most fruitful way of gathering together of those interested in historical research and in stimulating research activities of scholars all over India

I wish the Conference every success and trust that it will be a permanent feature among the annual Conferences in this country.’

Sir B. G. Wadia, Vice-Chancellor, Bombay University —

“I was very glad to know that the Osmania University Hyderabad (Deccan), is organising a Deccan History Conference. The study of Deccan History, especially of Muslim rule in the Deccan, has not so far received the attention it deserves. The great Bahmani Empire and its successors were the most tolerant and benevolent among the Muslim States of Mediaeval India. They drew on the traditions of the earlier Hindu Kingdoms and evolved a culture which was common to all. It was in the Deccan that one of the greatest statesmen and philosophers of Mediaeval India, Mahmud Gawan, tried to build up a political structure embodying the aspirations of the land. It was also in the Deccan that an attempt was first made to evolve a common language,—I refer to Rekhta or Dakhni Urdu.

The teaching of the mediaeval saints of the Deccan, and also the evolution of Deccan architecture, were the result of common ideals. Culturally, socially, and politically, no part of Mediaeval India was more conscious of its common heritage than the Deccan.

I hope this Conference will give an impetus to the study of this glorious history which reflects so much of the common basis underlying Hindu and Muslim cultures, and can give great help to those who believe in the ideals of a future united India."

Sir Ziauddin Ahmed, Vice Chancellor, Muslim University, Aligarh —

"Congratulations with firmest conviction that your Conference will lay foundation of Deccan History on permanent basis and open new avenues of exploration and research. Offer best wishes on my behalf and Muslim University for success."

T Singaravelu Mudaliar, Vice-Chancellor, Mysore University —

"I congratulate the organisers of the Deccan History Conference that is to be held with the object of promoting and encouraging the scientific study of Deccan history from the earliest times to the present day

Indian History as it is presented today is based upon a superficial knowledge of the early activities of the inhabitants of India. It is therefore none too early that Indians who are capable of making researches into the ancient history of India should undertake to present to the world the achievements of India which is believed to have once attained a very high stage of civilization

It is indeed fitting that the first Conference should be held in Hyderabad under the patronage of His Exalted Highness, the Nizam of Hyderabad, the patron of learning. I wish the Conference every success and hope that it will achieve the very laudable object with which it is inaugurated."

Vice Chancellor, Nagpur University —

"There is a good deal of historical material relating to the lands south of the Nerbada which requires exploration and critical investigation, and I am sure that the Deccan History Conference will succeed in enlisting the support of the scholars of history in this laudable task.

I convey my best wishes for the success of the first Session of the Deccan History Conference to be held at Hyderabad."

PROMINENT PERSONS.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru —

"Wish the Deccan History Conference every success in its laudable object"

Sir M Venkatsubba Rao —

"You carry out the best traditions of the State by holding the first session of the Deccan History Conference at Hyderabad. The potentialities for great achievement are immense and I send my best wishes both for the Conference and for the epoch-making undertaking”

Sri Shafaat Ahmad Khan —

“The Deccan History Conference has my warmest support and I know it will do excellent work as it is in capable hands. I feel, however, that it should be affiliated to the Indian History Congress, to avoid overlapping of work and dissipation of intellectual researches. There is a provision in the constitution of the Indian History Congress to that effect.”

Mr Syed Abdul Aziz, ex-Judicial Member, H E H the Nizam's Govt —

“It is gratifying for the public and stimulating for the Historians that the first session of Deccan History Conference is to be held in Hyderabad which occupies most central and unique position in southern India. Attractiveness of Hyderabad is enhanced by magnificent patronage extended by the industrious and scholarly ruler, His Exalted Highness the Nizam to science, arts, history literature and everything calculated to promote culture. Your illuminating and industrious contribution and valuable research of your collaborators will enrich the history of Deccan which has had varied developments in the past, worthy of students' close attention. The Conference has my best wishes for its success.”

Dr John Sargent —

Dr R E Mortimer Wheeler, Director General of Archaeology, Government of India —

“Warmest good wishes to the first Session of the Deccan History Conference. It marks beginning of new era in Deccan studies and must incidentally encourage archaeological research on which early Deccan history depends. Look forward greatly to be present on future occasions.”

Dr S N Sen, Director of Records, Government of India —

“Best wishes for the success of the Session.”

Reverend Father H. Heras. —

Dr Bishweshwar Prasad —

“The inauguration of the Deccan History Conference is a welcome move and, I have no doubt, will greatly stimulate the study of the history of one of the most important and historical regions of our country. While the Indian History Congress is devoted to the promotion of the study and research in the history of India as a whole, it is for the local Conferences to direct the search-light of historical criticism to the past of many component parts of our mother-land whose culture and history have contributed to build up the Indian nation. I wholeheartedly welcome this young association and hope that its example will be followed by other parts of our country. I wish the Deccan History Conference all success.'

Sugra Humayun Mirza Saheba —

'Main karkunane Conference ko mubarakbad deti hun ke unhon ne tarikh Conference munaqid karke Hyderabad aur Hyderabad walon ke lie kamiyabi wo tarqi ka bahut bara zina banadia, kyunki tarikh ek aisi chiz hai jiske sabab se purane zamane ke halat malum hote hain. Agar dunya mein tarikh na likhi jati to hamiko guzishtha zamane ke halat malum hi nahin hote. Bare bare badshahon ke halat se ham be khabar rahte. Khuda kare Conference kamiyab ho aur hamare mulk ko fayada pahonche.'

The Conference then placed on record its deep sense of gratitude to H E H the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar for his gracious Message in the form of the following resolution moved by the General President —

FUNCTIONS OF 11TH APRIL, 1945

The Ancient Section of the Conference met on 11th April, 1945, at 10 a.m., at the Arts College, Osmania University, under the Presidentship of Dewan Bahadur Dr. S. Krishnaswami Aiyangar. In his Presidential Address the Dewan Bahadur gave a general survey of different dynasties who held sway over the Deccan in ancient times. Taking the age of the Mahabharata as the starting point, he grouped round it a certain number of facts to gain thereby a chronological sequence. He referred to the Maurya period as the beginning of real historical knowledge of the Deccan. The Asoka edicts mentioned the Deccan States, under the authority of the Empire. The coming of the Andhra dynasty into power brought the Deccan definitely into the picture of history. The Western Capital of the Andhra Empire was at Paithan on the Godavari. When the Andhra Empire disintegrated, the dynasty which sprang into importance from this confusion was that of the Vakatikas. Then came the Chalukyas and the Rashtrakutas, who ruled over the whole of the Deccan. At the time of the Muslim invasion of the Deccan, three dynasties stood out prominently, the Yadavas of Deogiri, the Kakatiyas of Warangal and the Hoysalas of Dvairsamudra. There were half a dozen other chieftains of minor importance owing allegiance to one or other of these.

The Dewan Bahadur concluded his survey by claiming that his object was to rouse a certain amount of interest in the history of the region so that scholars interested in Deccan history might attempt to investigate and reconstruct their past.

The following papers were then read and discussed —

At 1-45 p.m. Nawab Zahir Yai Jung Bahadur invited the members of the Conference to lunch at the Bashir Bagh Palace after which the members visited the Hyderabad Museum.

The Mediaeval Section of the Conference met on 11th April, 1945 at 5-30 p.m. under the Presidentship of Prof Haroon Khan Sherwani. In the course of his Presidential Address he said that the Deccan had an individuality of its own which had been brought about by the action and reaction of different cultural influences. It seemed as if the table-land had acted as a buffer between the north and the South, between the Aryan and the Dravidian, between the followers of numerous Indian sects and between practically all the major languages of India. These actions and reactions of culture could not fail to create a common vehicle of thought. It was in the Deccan that the rapid evolution of Dakhni or Urdu took place. This language was patronized by the Adil Shahis and the Qutub Shahis. Its earlier prose was from the pen of that great saint of the Deccan, Hazrat Khwaja Bande Nawaz of Gulbarga as far back as the beginning of the fifteenth Century. Prof. Sherwani then gave a short account of the chief historians of Mediaeval Deccan. The President then requested the writers of papers to confine their expositions to five minutes each as the number of papers was considerable. The following papers were then explained by their writers and discussed —

- (1) The Relations of Madras with Golconda (1642-1687) by Rao Bahadur Srinivasachari (Annamalai University).

FUNCTIONS OF 12TH APRIL, 1945.

The Modern Section of the Conference met on 12th April, 1945, at 10 a m. when Rao Bahadur Prof. C S Srinivasachari delivered his Presidential Address. The President referred in his Address to the study of the factors that brought about the decay of the Muslim and Maratha powers and the rise and establishment, in the whole country, of British, in preference to other European domination. After surveying the reigns of different Asaf Jahi rulers, he stressed the need for studying the records of the achievements of the distinguished line of ministers, which formed an additional, suitable field of investigation. Their greatness may be traced back to the times of Sayyid Lashkar Khan and his great rival, Shah Nawaz Khan Samsam-ud-Daulah. The part played by Arastu Jah and Mir Alam in later politics required further elucidation. The history of the British Residency itself was another subject of arresting interest and political significance. In conclusion, Rao Bahadur Srinivasachari maintained that materials for the study of the modern phase of Deccan History were profuse. There were heaps of documents preserved in the Record Offices at various places and in the private collections of those families whose ancestors had played an important part in Government and politics.

Inaugural Address

By

Nawab Sir Mahdi Yar Jung Bahadur, M.A. (Oxon)

Ex-education Member, H E H the Nizam's Government

Hyderabad (Dn.)

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

BEFORE I proceed to declare open this first session of the Deccan History Conference, it is my privilege to read out to you the gracious Message which I have had the honour to receive from His Exalted Highness for delivery to you. The Message reads —

"I wish to congratulate the different bodies and individuals who have collectively organised the Deccan History Conference and the Deccan History Association - I also extend a hearty welcome to those outside scholars who have come to the Capital of my Dominions for attending the first session of the Conference

"In the wide perspective of the History of India, the History of the Deccan provides a study in miniature of the History of India itself, of different races and cultures, and their indelible impress on the different developments that have taken place in the course of the ages. The integration of these different factors with the History of India as a whole, by a process of specialisation and synthesis, is likely to provide an interesting approach to the study of that interplay of forces in the north and in the south which determined the course of history." Such study would not be of purely academic interest if it is made to embrace the important aspects of the life of the people at different epochs, rather than being confined to the chronology of wars or of the rise and fall of dynasties. Such a wide view of history would assist the practical application of historical knowledge to many present problems which confront the administrator or the sociologist.

"My Government is keenly interested in all these efforts and is engaging itself, through the University, the Daftar-i-Divani and the Archaeological Department, as well as by grants to learned bodies and individual scholars, in promoting the above ends. It would welcome the co-operation in all these activities, as in the compilation of the History of the Deccan, a work recently undertaken, of those outside scholars who evince an interest in the History of the Deccan. The Conference and the Association both provide an ample and welcome forum for attaining that co-operation and for imparting to it an organic and practical shape.

"I shall be closely interested in the progress of your deliberations and shall watch your efforts in the direction of sustaining and advancing the aims and the interests of the conference and the Association with profound sympathy "

I have also been desired by Nawab Sir Ahmad Said Khan of Chhatai, President of the Executive Council, to express to you his deep regret at having been unable to attend the Conference or to accept your invitation to open it. He has had to leave for Delhi yesterday, but he has asked me specially to tell you how much he appreciates the idea of forming a Deccan History Association and a Deccan History Conference. Some of you may recall that, in inaugurating the fifth session of the Indian History Congress in this City in December 1941, he had stressed the importance of the History of the Deccan and also the great need of viewing history without bias and from an objective point of view. He has, therefore, desired me to congratulate you all on this new adventure of yours and I wish personally to add my own congratulations to his.

It is not a mere coincidence that the Deccan has become the home of some of the most renowned relics of Indian History, such as the world-famous caves of Ellora and Ajanta, the magnificent temples at Ramappa and Palampet, the remains of mediaeval culture, like the Madrasa of Mahmud Gawan at Bidar, the Panchakki and the Bibi-ka Maqbara at Aurangabad. The geographical position of the Deccan justifies its claim to be the core of India, and it was thus only natural that it should have been the battlefield of empires and should have become the home of many races in early, mediaeval and modern times.

You will have, in the course of your stay in Hyderabad, occasion to visit the State Museum, the Daftar-i-Divani and the State Library. Along with the University, these institutions represent cultural activities which have received constant attention and encouragement from the State. Much work still remains to be done in the field of Deccan History, and, using these great institutions as a base, it is a welcome idea that there should be a forum for the work, large enough to ensure collaboration with outside scholars. I, therefore, wish your Association and your Conference all success, and convey to you also the same good wishes of the President of the Council whom we all miss here today He has always been of such immense help in all matters of cultural importance or interest.

I have now great pleasure in declaring your Conference open

Welcome Address

By

Nawab Ali Yavar Jung Bahadur,

Vice-Chancellor, Osmania University,

Constitutional Adviser to H E.H the Nizam's Government

Hyderabad (Dn).

NAWAB SIR MAHDI YAR JUNG BAHADUR,

MR. GRIGSON, SECTIONAL PRESIDENTS

OF THE CONFERENCE,

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

MY first words must be of deep gratitude to His Exalted Highness for his gracious Message. The Association and the Conference are fortunate to be the recipients of such high patronage, in terms so inspiring and royal.

The unavoidable absence of His Excellency the President of the Executive Council has caused us deep disappointment, fortunately, his choice of deputy for this inaugural function has fallen on Nawab Sir Mahdi Yar Jung Bahadur, up to five days ago Member for Education, whose wide culture and scholarly attainments, combined with silent and unostentatious devotion to the cause of Education, have brought him recognition as one of the foremost educationists in India.

Our selection of President has been equally happy. Mr Grigson has always exulted in intellectual activity, and his interests are so wide and varied as to range from prehistory and aboriginals to constitutional reforms and legal drafting. Despite being in charge of the three onerous portfolios of Revenue, Police and Supply, a well-guarded trade-secret enables him to read and write and study, and to combine the business of administration with the hobby of scholarship. Devoted to such stein mistresses as History, Archaeology and Anthropology, the aboriginals are his chief passion. They permit him in his moments of leisure, to indulge in the distraction of editing a new Gazetteer of Hyderabad and in the pleasures of compiling an anthology of Deccan History. The combination of these interests with the work of administration is most welcome, for, while we do not want in our administrators the "sombre, reluctant judgements" of the historian, we do wish them to have the background for a "sufficient hesitation" between the hasty generalization of administrative necessity and the inconvenient conclusions of patient research.

The Hyderabad session of the Indian History Congress, presided over by one whom, along with Dr Krishnaswami Aiyangar, I welcome today as one of our Sectional Presidents, left a great legacy of enthusiasm. One association took the initiative of combining with some others to explore the possibility of inaugurating a Deccan History Conference on an all-India basis. The idea led to another, and some of us, among them my friend, Nawab Inayat Jung, and myself, thought that the holding of a Conference should be but one of the objects of a Deccan History Association which could meet more often than a conference convened once in two years. (When, two days hence, we set to work to discuss the prosaic but necessary business of rules, we hope to present you with the full picture of these twin infants whom it is desired, now that they are born, to clothe and nurture.) We thus met and talked and wrote letters to great men and small, and, sustained by enthusiasm and hope, we proceeded to elect ourselves and select others, to organize and invite, believing that money would be found and that necessity would be its mother. There was method in that madness, money came from large hearts, members enrolled themselves, outside scholars wrote encouragingly and have now come. Our Sectional Presidents accepted the invitations extended to them, Mr Grigson agreed to preside, Sir Mahdi Yar Jung accepted the invitation to inaugurate the Conference, and the grim walls of financial and other "sanctions" crumbled at the touch of His Exalted Highness' patronage. That is how we come to be here today and I welcome you all and specially those who have had to undertake the inconvenience of a long journey.

As His Exalted Highness has been pleased to remark, the history of the Deccan is, in miniature, the history of India. It mirrors all the great reflexes of Indian History and throws its own reflection back on that larger screen. Within the wider perspective, therefore, of Indian History, there is ample scope for a more microscopic study of the history of the region which is called the "Deccan," if only because of its peculiarities, its self-contained fullness and variety, and the rich traditions of its many races. Separateness in the midst of geographical unity, isolation in the midst of invasion, such have been its characteristics. The resistance of the south to northern pressure provides an instance of the centrifugal forces which baffled successive efforts to establish one and the same rule over the length and breadth of India, and, even after its conquest by the Moghuls, the spirit of revolt reasserted itself in Hyderabad. Riding almost astride the peninsula, the Deccan has even otherwise played a decisive part in different periods in the history of India, and perhaps at no time a more significant role, from the point of view of the present day, than in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It was here that the French lost the battle for empire. It was here again that the earlier British experiments made in Oudh were perfected in the shape of the first subsidiary treaty with Hyderabad which came to be applied, in its fundamentals, to the States-system of India. The march of British supremacy in India was over the long and dusty road that led to Seringapatam, and from thence to Poona and Nagpur. Finally, it was in the Deccan that the torrents of the Mutiny spent their force.

It is appropriate that the first session of this Conference should take place not only in the capital of these Dominions, which occupy a large part of the Deccan, but also within the precincts of this spacious University which has made special efforts to promote the study of Deccan History by the inclusion of a separate paper on the subject in the curriculum for its History School and has now proposed the establishment of a Deccan History Museum and the inclusion of Archaeology, with special reference to these Dominions, in the course prescribed for its degree in History. A School of Social Sciences may also be started which will include the subject of cultural Anthropology, and the idea is Mr. Grigson's that the course should cover field-work among the aboriginals in the State, thus providing valuable training for personnel which could usefully be employed for work among the aboriginals and, even otherwise, for social service. The scheme for a comprehensive History of the Deccan has progressed satisfactorily, and the first volume on the ancient period is nearing completion under the editorship of Mr. Yazdani, whose individual work in the State may, with an apt reference to his service to Archaeology, be truly described as "monumental." A scheme of preservation of prehistoric sites has been undertaken by the Archaeological Department, to which has recently been attached an Advisory Board, on lines similar to the Board established by the Government of India, with the object of co-ordinating the efforts of that Department, the University and other learned bodies and individuals in all the wide and various fields of Archaeology. Plans for future expansion include the creation of local museums in historic towns like Bidar and on excavation sites, which will carry the interests of History and the historical perspective to the people in the districts. Substantial work has already been done in the field of Telugu and Muslim Epigraphy in the State; endeavours are now being made to concentrate on the wealth of Kanarese inscriptions. A Historian is being appointed in the Daftar-e-Divani to undertake, under the guidance of a Standing Committee, the work of preservation, classification, editing and publication of historical records. In that store-house of nearly twenty million records, the arduous task of classification and card-indexing has already begun, and a start has been made in the direction of "calendarizing" the Persian documents of Shah Jehan's period and about a hundred thousand of the Marathi documents. Dr Yousuf Husain Khan is to be thanked for having undertaken the first, and that doyen of Maratha history, Mr Sardesai, for the help he has given and is continuing to give with regard to the second. If Government agree, we may soon have a Hyderabad Historical Records Commission, with branches in the districts to undertake regional surveys. The recent decision, at the instance of the Standing Committee of the Daftar-e-Divani, to transfer all pre 1900 records from the different Secretariats to that office, will serve to centralize the older records and to ensure their proper classification and preservation. Among these records may eventually be found—as I did find in the case of the Home Secretariat Records—some at least which fill gaps of information relating to important chapters of the State's history. The discovery of firmans of Shah Jehan and of Asaf Jah the First in that Secretariat, and the vandalism of marking certain files for destruction which were found to be of considerable historical value, have led to a proposed revision of the current rules for destruction of papers, and, so far as Secretariat records are concerned, it has been decided, once a file or paper is marked for destruction, to entrust the task of destruction itself to the Daftar-e-Divani, thus enabling a process of ultimate checking from the historical point of view. Attempts to reorganize the Archaeological Department and the Daftar e-Divani have led to the conclusion that the services in those Departments require being classified separately for administrative and for technical purposes, the qualifications for the latter to be laid down in the light of the historical and other technical requirements of those Departments. For, it is not sufficient to get work done by direction, just as it is not enough merely to produce books, qualified hands are required at the base, if the work is to be of the required standard and if it is to be conducted otherwise than as routine. It is to the credit of His Exalted Highness' Government that, despite the booming of the guns across Europe and the Pacific, it has encouraged these and other cultural activities by a process of thoughtful and happy extravagance.

It occurs to me that in this brief summary of the work undertaken for the past two years or so, nothing has been said—and nothing has as a matter of fact, been done—regarding the economic aspects of Deccan History No "people's history" can be complete which does not take into account the economic conditions prevailing at different times, and even a disbeliever in the materialistic interpretation of history will not deny the importance of economic factors in the shaping of the life and history of a human community I address this suggestion particularly to the historians in this University and with special reference to the history of the Deccan

No research is easy, least of all research in history In an arena in which facts change their own values and new truths begin to trespass upon the sanctuary of previous convictions, the worker in historical research is faced with constant examination and the need for a mind as open as the skies His way leads through many woods and rocks and desert, and modern methods, in the endeavour to systematise the sifting of facts, impose upon him the duty of determining and distinguishing between the reliable and the unreliable source—a dry and relentless task, yet one which has to be undertaken if he is to have safe conduct in the journey down the ages For, unless the comparative worth and value of a fact, a reported incident, a description or a statement are tested on the thousand and one touchstones which determine the worth and value of the reporter or chronicler himself, how will he assess the truth? What follows is of the historian's own making, just as two different persons may draw two different conclusions from the same statistics, and it is well understood that a historian is licensed to have his own whims But the perspective created by research under a certain training of the mind tends to disallow digressions into pure fantasy and sets storey upon storey of facts to rebut subjective conclusions arrived at before the trial began What matters, therefore, is the raw material, so to speak, which goes to make the manufactured or finished product The Association and the Conference would do well to make a beginning by bringing several heads together to determine the raw material of Deccan History, and to distinguish, weigh and strain the alloy The rest resolves itself into a question of the equipment provided in the factory and the quality of the worker

What we must, in brief, insist on, adhering to the same metaphor, is a high standard of production, in other words, we must desist from the glorification of a pamphlet into a thesis Otherwise, the factory of our Universities is not required, and history will continue to be served by those nouveaux riches of historians who flaunt their single diamonds of so-called historical facts on their middle finger The basic plea is that we want historians, both amateur and professional, but not historical journalists future historians, archaeologists and anthropologists are made. With its function of dispassionate study, its duty of sifting the truth, its business of learning and unlearning, a University has to be a universe in itself, and universal in its conception. It must accommodate different schools of thought and opposite points of view, just as the larger world outside provides asylum for widely divergent ideals. "It is the place to which a thousand schools make contributions, in which the intellect may safely range and speculate sure to find its equal in some antagonistic activity, and its judge in the tribunal of truth. It is a place where enquiry is pushed forward, and discoveries verified and perfected, and rashness rendered innocuous and error exposed, by the collision of mind with mind, and knowledge with knowledge" (Newman). It is thus in a University that research, whether in the field of science or history, finds its proper habitation and home, and perhaps no house of learning can better accommodate researches into the history of the Deccan than the Osmania University.

One word more. We are not gathered to inculcate parochialism or to forget our sense of proportion or perspective. The Deccan is larger than these Dominions, and is again part of a wider entity. In undertaking the microscopic study of the part, let us not forget the whole, or fail to distinguish the wood from the trees. It was not the intention of those who first conceived the idea of this Conference and Association to be the Maginots of the historical front, endeavouring to create a ring-fence of history south of the waters of the Nerbada. Far less was it their intention to raise mud-walls within their own domain of the Deccan. They believe, on the contrary, in a more proper, deeper integration of the history of the Deccan with the history of India. If we are to be guilty at all of lack of proportion, let us be guilty in the opposite sense, let us cross the Nerbada, and, like the Ceylonese who claimed that India was included in Ceylon, let us lay claim to India and extend, in a spirit of conquest, the historical frontiers of the Deccan to the natural frontiers of India.

Presidential Address

By

The Hon'ble Mr. W. V. Grigson, C.S.I., I.C.S.

Revenue, Police and Supply Member,

H E H. the Nizam's Government

Hyderabad (Dn).

NAWAB SIR MAHDI YAR JUNG BAHADUR,
MR. VICE-CHANCELLOR, SECTIONAL
PRESIDENTS OF THE CONFERENCE,
LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

I count it a singular privilege to be the General President of this Inaugural meeting of this All-India Deccan History Conference, a privilege however for which I feel myself quite unqualified, for all the words used of me by Nawab 'Alī Yavar Jung Bahadur (whom I am sure you would like me to congratulate on behalf of the Conference on his accession to the great and responsible position of Vice-Chancellor of the Osmania University) cannot conceal the fact that so far as I have an interest in history and even in anthropology, it is the interest of an amateur, and for an amateur to preside over a conference of professional historians is a presumption which I hope may be pardoned. I have not even had, for my excursions into the fields of anthropology and history, the excuse of the "grounding of academic discipline, save in so far as a traditional classical education, somewhat interrupted by the last war, opened my eyes through the study of Greek and Roman civilization to a wider interest in the study of Man. Perhaps too something in what Matthew Arnold in those well-known words of his about Oxford spoke of as "the whispering from her towers of the last enchantments of the Middle Age" has always sustained in me a deep and fascinated interest in the past of all countries, particularly of England and India.

The last sentence might justify an accusation of being attracted by the romantic and not the severely factual, scientific and economic side of history. To be thus attracted may also be another mark of the amateur. But is it the worse for that? Has not the history of every country that is so fortunate (despite Carlyle) as not to be one of the peoples "whose annals are blank in history-books," enough of the elements of high romance to fire the imagination, quicken the pulse and stimulate endeavour? And what are the histories that are read and re-read by wide audiences? Are they the dry-as-dust chronicles of events, or learned disquisitions on political and economic tendencies, or the works that appeal to the imagination, to the romantic imagination? To think of history in terms of romance is at least better than to think of it in the many other terms that have been applied to it, whether "a pack of lies" in the view attributed to Kingsley in William Stubbs' epigram, or "bunk" in the contemptuous evidence of a certain trans-Atlantic billionaire, or, in the soberer words of Carlyle, the "essence of innumerable biographies" or "a distillation of rumours."

But it is a fact that too much of the early work on the history and the anthropology of India has been done by amateurs, members often of my own or other civil or military services, whether in the form of monographs on tribes or local history, or serious historical studies, or of articles in such compilations as the Imperial and District Gazetteers. How great a thing therefore it is to see a modern generation of trained Indian scholars taking up the work of detailed, scientific, ethnographic and historical research and publication within their own country! Yet even now it is far too often impossible for a traveller or a sojourner in a specific part of India to get into his hands a compact and readable—I would emphasise the word readable—account of the local history. How lacking in India are local histories and local studies! Even this Conference sets before it primarily the studies of an enormous region, the Deccan, or India south of the Nerbada. If the term "Deccan" be restricted to the country which passed under Muslim rule from the days of 'Ala-ud-Din Khilji until the fall of the Mughal Empire, even then the region remains enormous, and calls for a vast degree of specialisation and for the stimulation of local patriotism and local pride into the recording of the history of each locality.

The Vice-Chancellor has alluded to our endeavours to produce a completely new revision of the Hyderabad Gazetteer. In this we are carrying on the tradition of those many British Indian pioneers—amateurs if you like—from Sir Alfred Lyall, Sir Charles Grant, Sir William Hunter onwards, and trying to give the people of Hyderabad a succinct and up to-date account of the past and present of their State. Hyderabad is unfortunate in that, apart from one excellent volume on Aurangabad District written as long ago as 1884, there are no district gazetteers of the State. Though such gazetteers exist for all the provinces of British India and for many of the States, they are now nearly all regrettably and hopelessly out of date in regard not only to modern conditions but also to recent advances in historical, archaeological and ethnographic research. (The Mysore Government of course set the rest of India a good example by their 1930 production of an eight-volume State Gazetteer) Immense strides have been made by Indian History in the past forty years, and it is therefore the more regrettable that so many writers, particularly young writers and writers of thesis for university degrees, continue uncritically to use the historical articles contained in out-of-date gazetteers as authorities, neglecting not only the results of recent research, but also often the works of earlier Muslim historians and modern commentaries upon them. Possibly therefore we have not been altogether unfortunate in having had no early district gazetteers of this State. We should now hope to see this work of dealing with the past and present of our districts, our Samasthans and other estates taken up in a scientific and realistic manner by teams of scholars from the Osmania University and the Nizam College. Such local professional talent has in fact been pressed into the service of the new State Gazetteer, but we still continue, and must continue, to draw upon the administrator and the district officer for descriptive accounts and modern statistics.

Yet all things considered, the debt of history, archaeology, ethnography, exploration linguistics and other sciences in India to the amateur in the services of the Crown or of the Indian State is a great debt, and a source of pride to anyone who may have continued in any degree the work of that long line of predecessors, even if he can now be strong in the assurance that they are at last so largely replaced by the professional scholar.

Who, nevertheless, professional or amateur, living or serving in this country of the Deccan could fail to be inspired by the great and romantic story of her past? Each district of this State has its history and traditions, of which living testimony is afforded by historic temples, mosques and lakes or fortress-crowned hill-tops, while stone artifacts in abundance, stone-circles, rock-shelters (sometimes still inhabited), stone-alignments, menhirs, tumuli and cairns in many districts provide yet older links with the forgotten eras of prehistory. The Vice-Chancellor spoke of some "well-guarded trade secret" of mine enabling me to combine the business of an administrator with the study of history, archaeology and anthropology. But I maintain that to go about the Deccan blind to its past and to its fascinating present survivals would be to lose most of what can keep life worth living, work worth doing and the future worthy of hope and endeavour. Who can see the splendour of the golden evening falling on the castle walls of Golkonda without longing to repicture the past of that great city? He can see perhaps, with the eyes of the Dutchman Anthony Schorer, the King of Golkonda in the opening years of the seventeenth century emerging in state from his palace, followed by a vast crowd of retainers and nobles, some on horseback and some in palanquins, into what an earlier traveller Ralph Fitch, 20 years before, spoke of as "a very faire towne, pleasant with fair houses of bricke and timber," and a contemporary, William Methwold, described as "a citie that for sweetnesse of ayre, convenience of water and fertility of soyle, is accounted the best situated in India," in which the King's palace "for bignesse and sumptuousnesse in the judgement of such as have travelled in India exceedeth all belonging to the Mogull or any other Prince," all built of stone and, "within the most eminent places garnished with massie gold in such things as we commonly use iron, as in barres of windows, bolts and such like." He can visualise that strange annual occasion spoken of in 1614 by the unknown Dutch author of A Description of the Country ruled by King Cotebipa (Qutb Shah) and, in greater detail, by William Methwold, the annual trooping over the royal road from Masulipatam to Bhagnagar or Hyderabad of all the dancing girls of the Coromandel Coast to dance before the King of Golkonda.

Of the earlier of the European travellers in the Deccan, selections from whose writings I am trying to combine into the anthology mentioned by Nawab 'Ali Yavar Jung Bahadur, the most vivid pictures are given by Jean-Baptiste, Tavernier, Baron of Aubonne, who visited Golkonda at least five times between 1643 and 1662. He describes his entry into Hyderabad or Bhagnagar, crossing the Musi by "a grand stone bridge" "scarcely less beautiful than the Pont du Neuf at Paris", into a town comparable, but for the dust of the unpaved streets, with Orleans, full of mosques and palaces, caravanserais and gardens the great Mecca Masjid was under construction which would be "the grandest in all India if it should be completed" (it never was!) He saw the daily feeding of bread and prasad to the poor at the Tombs of the Qutb Shahi Kings at Golkonda and, what seemed to him a really beautiful sight, those tombs covered with rich carpets on festival days. He never tired of the pageantry of the chief nobles mounting guard at the King's Palace every Monday, each in his turn. The procession would be led by 10 or 12 elephants, after which came 30 or 40 camels, walking two by two, each saddled and carrying a small culverin or camel gun, "which a man, clad in a skin from head to foot, like a pantaloon, and seated on the cupper of the camel with a lighted match in hand," quickly turned from side to side before the balcony where the King was seated. Then came carriages, surrounded by footmen, followed by led-horses, and, preceded by ten or twelve leaping and dancing women, the Noble to whom all this train belonged, with behind him in good order his cavalry and infantry.

Pieter De Lange, a young Dutch surgeon in the Batavian envoy's service, left against his will at Golkonda in the King's service on a salary of 800 pagodas, described to Tavernier in 1652 how he was sent for to bleed the Qutb Shahi monarch under the tongue, but before he could be admitted into the Presence had to be taken by eunuchs to a bath, where he was undressed and scrubbed, especially his hands, by four old women, anointed with drugs and aromatics, and clothed in garments made "according to the fashion of the country." His success brought him a reward of 300 pagodas from the King and he had also, after yet further ablutions, to bleed the young Queen and the Queen-dowager, who held their arms out through a hole in a curtain to be bled, but were really more anxious to see this strange young foreigner than to be thus treated.

* The pages of Bernier's Travels (1656-1668), of the Storia Do Mogor (1653-1708) of that great gossip, artilleryman and physician Niccolao Manucci and of Dr John Fryer's New Account of East India and Persia (begun in 1672 and finished in 1681), continue the story of the decline and fall of Golkonda and the other kingdoms of the Deccan and the wars of succession after the death of Aurangzeb. Here the curious will find many a picture not only of the pomp and ceremony of the great but of the conditions of rich and poor, local superstitions, or such stories as those told by Manucci (whose patients at one time or another included Tana Shah, the last King of Golkonda, the family of Shah 'Alam, son of Aurangzeb, and the great Asaf Jah) of how Tana Shah "proved both his wisdom and his sense of justice" when a favourite doctor of the Muhammadan Law, who passed as a good man, stole from the King a costly jewelled dagger, by not ordering his execution but having him paraded through the streets and proclamation made by beat of drum that anyone suggesting that the doctor had stolen the dagger would be executed. Bernier and Fryer both describe the sorry state to which Mughal suzerainty reduced the last rulers of Golkonda, unable to resist Aurangzeb's demands for money or troops to fight against their own ally of Bijapur, and with a Mughal ambassador installed in Hyderabad issuing his own orders, granting passports, browbeating the people and acting as absolute sovereign, with the coinage debased and with Dutchmen and Portuguese interfering with the commerce of the country, while the King assumed a guise of weakness, indecision and indifference, to deceive his Mughal enemies. The great final siege of Golkonda lives again for us in the enthralling account compiled by Sir Wolseley Haig in his early volume on the landmarks of Deccan History, and still the visitor to Golkonda can trace the scenes of the events of those last unhappy days.

The more modern memoirs of Malcolm and Mountstuart Elphinstone depict for us the Nizam's Court in the early years of the nineteenth century, Malcolm amongst other things giving probably the first account of what still remains a feature of Hyderabad, a big auction sale of the property of a retiring Englishman, during which the floor gave way with a crash in the middle of the bidding for a double-barrelled gun, and he was precipitated down to the ground-floor with the crowd of bidders and beer, china and tables on his head. There are famous passages in Meadows Taylor's Confessions of a Thug describing a first view of Hyderabad in 1837 with its white-terraced houses gleaming brightly in the sunlight beyond the river amidst what seemed from the distance to be a forest of trees, the Charminar and the Mecca Masjid rising proudly from the surrounding masses of buildings, here and there white domes with bright gilt spires marking the tomb of some saint, and all around the slender white minarets of hundreds of smaller mosques, and the procession of the Nal Sahib during the Moharram festival of the same year. From more recent and more prosaic works such as the autobiography of Sir Richard Temple, the Journals of Lady Dufferin, Sir J D Rees' account of the Duke of Clarence's Tour in Southern India or Sir Michael O'Dwyer's reminiscences, the reader may get such sudden and unforgettable pictures of Hyderabad as Temple's visits to the Nizam and the Langar festival of 1867, the State Darbar and banquet, and sunset over Mir Alam's lake from the deck of a small steamer, during Lord Dufferin's visit to Hyderabad as Viceroy in 1886; the breakfast given to the royal duke by the late Sir Viqar-ul-Omra at the end of which all the guests were given large bulging buns, each bun when opened discharged a charming little wax-bill bird which flew upwards from its pastry prison and alighted chirping on the chandeliers, and O'Dwyer riding over the streets devastated by the great Musi flood of 1908. Even unexpectedly in so purely English a work as Parson Kilvert's Diary (1870-1879) comes a sudden allusion to Hyderabad in an account taken from a letter from his sister, Mrs. Wyndowe, of a journey upcountry from Bombay with her husband, their arrival at the Hyderabad Residency "in their bullock transits, their horses having jibbed and broken down" and a moment when the horses struck work in the midst of a violent midnight thunder-storm, the pouring rain, the stifling heat of the carriage, the wailing hungry baby, the lightning-lit, barren, dreary landscape, and the motionless figures of the escort of Sowar horsemen.

It would be possible to go on for hours with similar pictures, not only of Hyderabad, but of all parts of the State. If you are touring in Aurangabad you may think of Pietro Della Valle's dark tale of the sorceries of Malik Ambar, the Habshi minister of the Nizam Shahi King of Ahmadnagar, who "to make prodigious buildings, and with good luck, that the same may last perpetually and succeed well" with "certain supersitions used in those Countries, committed most horrid impieties and cruelties, killing hundreds of his slaves, children and others and offering them as in sacrifice to the invoked Devils", of Tavernier seeing the great spans of oxen drawing the carts loaded with marble from Northern India for the building of the Bibi-ka-Maqbara tomb at Aurangabad of Aurangzeb's wife, Rabia Daurani, of Manucci watching Aurangzeb, old and feeble, carried with drums and music and propped up with cushions and by strong arms, through his evil-smelling camp, to reassure his half-mutinous troops that he was still alive, of Elphinstone at the battle of Assaye, galloping forward with General Wellesley, who afterwards became Duke of Wellington, to a line which opened fire on them as they approached, when ' 'Somebody said, Sir, that is the enemy's line" The General said, "Is it? Ha, damn it, so it is" (you know his manner) and turned', of Wellesley passing that night in the village of Assaye "not in the pride, pomp and circumstances of glorious war" but on the ground, close to an officer whose leg was shot off and within five yards of a dead officer, while Elphinstone himself got as food and drink 'some curry and bloody water, which did not show at night, and lay down and slept without catching cold', of the Frenchman Victor Jacquemont in 1832 on his way to die at Bombay passing through the district, but seeing Ajanta, Daulatabad, the caves of Ellora and the tomb of Aurangzeb, whom he describes as a very nasty fellow, but a very good king, because he made roads and sunk wells instead of building palaces, and lodging with Col Seyer in Aurangabad and having his saddle-bags loaded by him with the most excellent of books. If you are in Raichur District at the fortress town of Mudgal, you will think of the battles between Vijayanagar and Bijapur for the hand of the goldsmith's beautiful daughter, of the Roman Catholic Mission there which was mentioned by Meadows Taylor and still exists on land granted 250 years ago by an 'Adil Shahi King, or of the long siege in 1791 of Kopbal Fort held by Tippu Sultan's men against the Nizam's forces and British artillerymen under Captain Andrew Read. Warangal, Nalgonda, the districts around Hyderabad and Jagtial and Nirmal recall memories of Raymond and other Frenchmen who at that time dreamed of setting back the clock against English progress in India. Along the old royal road from Masulipatam through Suriyapet and across Nalgonda District to Hayatnagar and Hyderabad you still can see the stone pillars that stood on either side of the old road (and sometimes flank the modern road) to mark each kos along the road, and can trace the former halting stages by the old sarais and mosques. At Warangal you can drink from a modern town water-supply piped from a tank built centuries ago by Hindu kings, and picture to yourself the desperate struggles of the Kakatiya kingdom to retain its independence, if your travels have taken you to Bastar State you may know the Bastar legend of Anand Deo, the brother of the last Kakatiya king, reaching the farther bank of the Godavari in his flight north and flinging the most coveted possession of the Kakatiyas, the Philosopher's Stone, into the waters of the Godavari in the face of his Muslim pursuers, who thereupon abandoned the pursuit and were set by their commanders to dredge the river to recover the stone, once and once only the dredges touched the stone and were turned to gold, but the Stone lies for ever beneath the waters. In Adilabad District amongst the Gonds you can pass into a totally different world of Gond myth and legend, much of which is now being revealed to us by the forthcoming work on the Gonds of Adilabad by Baron Christoph von Furer-Haimendorf.

Today one may see the life of the past still being enacted. On my first tour in these Dominions I was lodged for two nights in the fort of Kalyani, once the capital of Chalukyan Kings, through the kindness of the Nawab of Kalyani, passing in our progress through the successive gates of the fort between rows of retainers dressed as they might have been centuries earlier, and listening through the darkness to the watches of the night being announced by music from the battlements. In the fort the Nawab Sahib showed us his collection of weapons, porcelain, celadon ware, a mediaeval Indian map of the world and old miniature paintings, including a miniature of Queen Chand Bibi among her warriors. In the palace of the Raja of Shorapur, built there for the last reigning Raja by Meadows Taylor, you may sit in a hall listening to the music of Kanarese stringed instruments, the walls hung with framed sanads of 'Adil Shahi kings and a grant made by Aurangzeb under his veritable Sign Manual, the imprint of the imperial hand. Recently in Hyderabad when hearing a royal grant succession appeal relating to another Bedar family, my colleague and I were confronted with an 'Adil Shahi Persian sanad issued by Shivaji's enemy, Afzal Khan, which had a flowery and ornately worded Persian preamble ending with words of which the literal translation is "at whose name even the Angels in Paradise cry aloud, Afzal, O Afzal!"

Lastly I must mention some practical aspects of the business of this Conference. Nawab 'Ali Yavar Jung Bahadur in his speech has envisaged the creation of a Hyderabad Historical Records Commission with branches in the districts to undertake regional surveys. How essential this is may be judged not only from such instances as those which I have just mentioned, but also from our knowledge of the valuable collections in the possession of many Hyderabad noblemen. Hyderabad also has several fine private libraries of mediaeval and later Persian and Urdu manuscripts and printed books, calling aloud for classification and publication. Nawab 'Ali Yavar Jung Bahadur has referred to the great Daftar-i-Divani collection, where of the 20,000,000 or more documents of all kinds only some 3,000,000 (including atayat or Crown Grant succession documents) were catalogued on the old unsatisfactory system and so far only 3,000 documents have been listed in a new card index. There is immense work to be done, nor can it be said what discoveries will result. At present the annual budget of the Daftar-i-Divani is a bare $1\frac{2}{3}$ lakhs of rupees. We must clearly double or treble that expenditure and make it a real focus for historical studies in the Deccan.

If earlier in this address I referred rather disparagingly to learned disquisitions on economic tendencies, please do not envisage me as underestimating the value of studies of economics of the past, my plea is that they should be made readable, and I am deeply conscious of the need of a detailed economic history of the Deccan. For such studies too we have invaluable material in the Daftar-i-Divani in the form of old Persian records of revenue settlements and revenue-farming, and contemporary nirakhnamas of wages and prices, all calling for the patient work of the research scholar in history and economics, material in fact such as W. H. Moreland would have considered as beyond value could he have had access to similar documents for his economic histories of Mughal India.

Mention of yet another field of research, to which the attention of scholars, and in particular of this Conference, must be invited, was foreshadowed by my remarks earlier on the folklore of the Gonds. In many villages around such historic centres as Golkonda, Warangal, Daulatabad, Aurangabad and Shorapur I believe there to be untapped stores of tales and ballads of the days of the past. Fact and fantasy may be so interwoven in this early literature as to make it difficult to distil factual history from it. But its systematic collection would throw great light upon what struck the villager's imagination in the past, his reaction to changes of dynasty, to invasion, and to disappearance of what seemed good to him. Some work of a similar nature is being done for Middle India by Dr. Verrier Elwin whose collections of what he calls "Specimens of the Oral Literature of Middle India" have led already to the publication by the Oxford University Press in Bombay of The Folk-Songs of the Marhal Hills and The Folk-Tales of Mahakoshal, the first two of a projected series of seven or eight volumes. Haimendorf's researches in Adilabad have shown a wealth of similar material amongst our own Deccan tribes, some of which our Government have recently published, in the Gond language and the Nagari script, as text-books for the new aboriginal schools in the Gond country. Systematic recording of such material has long been overdue in India. Few studies can foster so healthy a national pride. Great studies in this direction have been made in Europe, especially in the Scandinavian and Teutonic countries and in England and Ireland. Sweden was the pioneer, and work there was started on a systematic scale so long ago as May 1630 under the auspices of King Gustavus Adolphus II, who issued a programme of investigation touching most aspects of Swedish Culture —

“runic stones and other remains, time reckoning, the traditional laws of crafts and parishes, legends, sagas, and ballads, with their accompanying melodies, the traditions of the nobility, clergy, officials, lawyers, townsmen, and farmers, both as orally transmitted and as recorded in letters, church archives, and libraries, customs surrounding land tenure, mining, house-keeping accounts, methods of fishing, hunting, cattle-breeding, and forestry, popular medicine and weather-lore, material culture, and the dialect terms for all objects, and, finally, the mental characteristics of the people of each district’

That beginning has led ever since to sustained work in Sweden. And there are now in that comparatively small country 400 museums with collections illustrating local culture, and four institutes and archives of folklore. As a more recent example of Government action in another country may be mentioned the foundation in 1930 of the Irish Folklore Institute by the Irish Government and its subsequent development, as a result of representations made to President De Valera by a Swedish folklore scholar, into the Irish Folklore Commission, on a basis permitting nine full-time collectors, equipped with recording apparatus, to work in the field, supplemented by over 150 part-time collectors in different parts of the country. I would urge most strongly that our own University should be spurred by this Conference into considering similar work in the Deccan while there is yet time, before the standardization and proletarianization of modern life have stilled the voice of the bard and the storyteller. I would also particularly stress the urgency in Hyderabad not only of folk museums in the life of her villages and tribal populations, but also, and above all, of a Hyderabad museum of Quth Shahi and Mughal life, before a vast amount of material still in the hands of private owners disappears through the break-up of old families or under the auctioneer's hammer. If for this purpose the State were able to acquire one of the old palaces in the City or could be granted the use of one of the Golkonda palaces so that it could be furnished in contemporary style and could house collections of paintings, porcelain, objects of art, and manuscripts, it could be a great inspiration not only to scholars but also to the whole modern generation. I confidently look forward to an impetus to such work being given, not only by this great Osmania University under its Vice-Chancellor with his keen interest in all historical studies, not only by this Conference and by the permanent organization that we hope may result from it, but also by the projected School of Social Sciences and Anthropology to which Nawab ‘Ali Yavar Jung Bahadur has referred, and above all by the munificence and patronage of the many noble and other collectors in Hyderabad. Here too opens out an immense field for the future employment of the trained graduates of our University and Colleges.

Great indeed is the stimulus to all such work that can be provided by a live and keen Deccan History Association focussed on Hyderabad with, as one of its chief functions, an Annual Conference such as the present. We have long had in Hyderabad a Historical and Archaeological Society, but its membership has been small and its meetings very infrequent. I should like to see this merged into the Deccan History Association, and that Association strengthening itself by local branches in all centres where there is a nascent interest in history and archaeology. We have naturally envisaged this Association as based upon Hyderabad and making use of the living traditions of this great inheritor of South Indian history and tradition. But we intend no parochial Hyderabad view of Deccan History, we feel that the more we can bring together the work of all students of Deccan History the greater will have been our success in achieving the objects of the new Association. We hope in fact that this Association will create a nexus between our scholars and scholars in other parts of India and beyond India. We are also confident that the existence of such an Association, in the traditional centre of an area that has played and will continue to play so great a role in India's history, will effectively arouse and maintain popular interest in historical studies in general and Deccan History in particular. May this fellowship of All-India scholars also achieve, not only for the administrator, but also for the politician and the politically-minded citizen of Southern India, that appreciation of the historical background of our social, administrative and political problems, to the necessity of which His Exalted Highness referred in his gracious Message, and without which those problems can never find a satisfactory solution !

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

BY

DEWAN BAHADUR DR. S KRISHNASWAMI AIYANGAR,
M.A , PH.D. (Hony)

IT is familiarly known that if I should address letters to Hyderabad by post, I shall have to address Hyderabad Dakhan. Of course, it is understood that this is merely to distinguish Hyderabad here from the Hyderabad in Sind. Perhaps it is not quite so easily understood why the Dakhan is so called. For a mere derivation, Dakhan is the Prakrit form, even modernised Prakrit, of the Sanskrit Dakshina. Dakshina means the right hand or right side, and derivatively the south. It is in this latter sense that it is used when we mark our letters Hyderabad Dakhan. The term actually occurs in the Veda itself. One of the hymns of the Rig Veda¹ contains the term Dakshināpada. It occurs in a context referring to the place where one goes on being expelled. According to one school of interpretation this is held to mean the south. Whether that is so or no in Sanskrit literature with regard to the discussion of the Veda, the grammarian Panini² uses the term Dākshinātya, meaning an inhabitant of the south. The term Dākshināpatha itself is used in the Baudhāyana Sutra coupled with Surashtṛa.³ Thereafter the term gets into frequent use and becomes more or less familiar. Literally it would mean only the road to the right, or geographically, the road to the south, but in later usage, it is generally taken to mean more or less the region of the south, which would imply, if that was the earlier meaning, knowledge of the country beyond the Vindhya and the Narmada. We have evidence of the earliest literature for this knowledge. For purposes of history, however, it may not be of very great value that literature should refer to Dakshināpatha itself, or to any of the countries included in the region. We ought to have at any rate a chronological basis for it.

We may take the age of the Mahābhārata more or less as our starting point, because we have more or less definite statements that the time that expired from the installation of Parikshit to the reign of Mahāpadmananda is 1050 years. There is a variant reading 1015. We may for the moment neglect the difference of 25, and take it roughly as 1050. From the known date of Mahāpadmananda, who was in all probability ruling at the time when Alexander invaded India, this would give us for the installation of king Parikshit a date 1050 plus, say, 330, 1380 B C According to the Mahābhārata itself, the Pandavas ruled for 28 years after the war. Adding this, we get to 1400 B C or a little earlier for the war itself. It is not a matter of importance as to what exactly was the precise date, say about 1400 B C would be the time of the great war. The name Parikshit and his son Janamejaya are names of frequent occurrence in Brahmanical literature. Taking them as the starting point, we can group round them a certain number of well-known persons and facts to gain thereby a more or less correct chronological idea. One famous character in literature is the famous Janaka of Mithilā; but unfortunately for us, Janaka is a common family name for rulers of Mithilā, and a number of Janakas ruled and passed away. We know of a Janaka who was contemporary with Yāgyavalkya. Just a few generations after Janaka, the contemporary of Parikshit, the dynasty seems to have gone out of existence, and the territory till then known as the kingdom of Mithilā came to be under the rule of an influential tribe of people known as the Licchavis, with a government which was not exactly monarchical. We find this was the government at the time when the two religious teachers Buddha and Vardhamana, the founders of Buddhism and Jainism, lived and preached. Similarly a few generations, about five, after Janamejaya, the capital of the Pandavas, Hastināpura on the Ganges was washed away by the river, and a successor of Janamejaya removed himself from there and founded the kingdom of Kosāmbi, not far from Allahabad. The ruler of Kosāmbi by name Udayana followed immediately after the age of the Buddha, and was contemporary with the well known ruler Ajātsatru and his son Darsaka. So it is possible to mark epochs of importance like this, and on the basis of these epochs we can form an idea of the kingdoms that existed in the Dakhan.

In the age of the Mahābhārata, the kingdom of Vidarbha south of the Vindhya was a well-known kingdom. That was the home of Krishna's wife Rukmini, and in the story relating to the marriage of Krishna with this princess, figure a number of kingdoms relating to each other in that region. All these kingdoms played their part in the war of the Mahābhārata itself. One point that is of particular importance in connection with this we should know. Krishna's marriage with Rukmini took place against the wishes of the parents and her elder brother, who had arranged for her marriage with the contemporary Chedi ruler. Krishna therefore had to arrange to go and carry her away on the eve of the marriage, and marry her afterwards. When Krishna thus carried her off, a war ensued and the brother-in-law, who was very keen in getting his sister married to the Chedi king, and who did not like Krishna at all, went and fought against him, having sworn beforehand not to enter his father's capital if he should not recover his sister and get her married as he had arranged. Of course, he was defeated, and he kept his vow by giving up his capital Kundinapura, and built for himself a new citadel outside the town and resided there afterwards when he succeeded his father Bhishmaka. This new capital became known as Bhojakitaka, what is referred to as Bhojakata in historical times. We shall come to that later.

Another well-known ruler of Vidarbha is called Bhima. He had his capital in the same place, Kundinapura. He had one daughter and three sons. The Daughter was called Damayanti. The marriage of Damayanti with the ruler of the neighbouring kingdom of Nishāda by name Nala forms an important episode in the Mahābhārata, and the story of Nala and Damayanti has become so popular that there are many variants of the story incorporated in literature. This Bhima was known to the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa where he is referred to as a contemporary of two Nishis, Paivata and Nārada, and a number of rulers, Somaka, son of Sahadeva, Sahadeva, son of Srinjaya, Bābhava, son of Devavridha and Nagnajit, king of Gandhara. Another contemporary of this Nagnajit of Gandhara was Nami or Nimi of Mithila. It is under Nami's successor that the Mithila kingdom came to an end, and possibly the rule of the Lichchavis began. So the time of Bhima of Vidarbha would be just about the time when the kingdom of Mithila went out of existence as a kingdom. This would be some five or six generations after Janamejaya. In the story of Nala and Damayanti, as it is recited in the Mahābhārata, there is one important geographical detail which must be noted. In the course of the story when the husband and the wife were on their way into the forests after losing kingdom and all in the game at dice, Nala indicates to Damayanti, casually the road to Vidarbha, her father's kingdom. Nala was the king of the Nishādas, generally described in the Puranas and the Mahābhārata as a Vindhyan tribe. The exact location of his kingdom is a matter of doubt, although that it was somewhere about the Vindhyan region is clear. Having been some days on his journey from his capital, he indicated the road by pointing out "this is the road that, passing across Avanti and the mountain Rikshavat, leads on to Dakshinapatha," and he further indicated from where he spoke, by pointing to the Vindhya mountains and the river Payoshni reaching the sea, the branching of roads. He pointed out to one, perhaps the nearer one, as leading to Vidarbha, and the other one passing on to Kosala. He followed it up by the statement that beyond these lies Dakshinapatha. The points that we are to note here are that Nala was speaking apparently from the southern side of the Vindhyas. The road that he indicated took people through the kingdom of Avanti, passed the mountain Rikshavat and the river Payoshni, probably the Narmada, then it branches off, one going straight to Vidarbha, and the other to Kosala. Vidarbha is an indefinite country, but the modern equivalent Berar may not be wrong, as at any rate the capital was situated within the boundaries of Berar. Kosala is a very extensive tract and the reference here is to the portion called Mahakosala, the middle region extending over the whole of the Central Provinces and including even some portion of Central India called by the name Dasārṇa separately, the capital of which was Vidisa, in Eastern Malva in later history. He pointed out that the country further south of these was Dakṣhināpatha. He called it actually the country of Dakṣhināpatha, and we come to gain a rather clear idea of what was understood by the term Dakṣhināpatha at the time when this was written. This would correspond in a general way to the dominions of His Exalted Highness the Nizam now, and the neighbouring parts of Bombay.

Passing down the stream of time, we come to another landmark where this part of the country is under reference, in a Jataka story of the Buddha called Sarabhangā Jataka,⁵ this part of the country comes under reference. Here the Buddha in his previous birth as "Sarabhangā" was living on the banks of the Godavari at a place called Kavitha (Kapitha) forests. In the course of his residence, the hermitage getting too crowded, he sent out a number of disciples, each one with his own following to the neighbouring regions. Among them one called Kṣavaccha took his residence in the kingdom of Dandakī in the outskirts of the capital Kumbhavatī as it is called. There he gets ill-treated by chance, and in consequence the kingdom gets destroyed and reduced to a sandy waste for a circuit of 60 leagues (yojanas). This accounts for the name Dandakānaya given to it ever afterwards. There are two points of importance to be noted along with this. One of his disciples was asked by the Buddha (Sarabhangā) to go and settle down near Lambacūlaka in what was the province of king Chanda Pajjota. That merely indicates that he had to go and settle in what was the kingdom of Chanda Pajjota, all that was Avanti or Malva. When this destruction of Dandakā kingdom took place, three kings of subordinate kingdoms felt concerned about this transformation. These are said to have come and asked Sarabhangā as to why this took place, quoting other three instances where kings came to similar grief by ill-treatment accorded to holy men, as in this case. The three kings referred to are Kalinga, Atthaka and Bhimaratha. Of these the first two are probably names of the country. The third Bhimaratha seems to be the name of the king. We cannot say whether he is the Bhīma, the father of Damayanti, as no details that are associated with him give the colour that this story actually implies.

According to the Ramayana⁶ story, Danda or Dandaka was the last son of Yayāti. Finding him ill-cultured, the father allotted to him for his share a kingdom between the Vindhya and Saivala mountains. Dandaka made Uśanas (Sukāchārya) his Guru, and resided in his capital Madhura over a prosperous and well-peopled kingdom. His want of culture showed itself at the sight of the daughter of Sukra in the gardens round her father's hermitage, and fell in love with her at sight. When he approached her and made his overtures to her, she pointed out the unkingly character of the proposal, and asked the king in turn to apply to her father for her hand, and indicated that the father might consent to bestow her in marriage on him. Being too impatient, he then and there ravished her, and when that was understood by the father, he cursed the unworthy king, and the whole place became, for a distance of sixty leagues (yojanas), a desert. That, according to the story, is how the place became deserted. Usanas himself and all the people removed from the kingdom, and the borderland where they settled down came to be known as Janasthāna. We know from other references in the Ramayana that Janasthāna was a region in the upper reaches of the Godavari nearer her sources in the mountains, and the coast region set over against it is also, in a peculiar way, associated with the name of Rishi Usanas and the Bhārgavas (descendants of Rishi Bhrigu).

It is a large question as to which is the original story and which the modification, as between the Brahmanical account and the Buddhistic. We need not pause to inquire into that here. It seems likely that the Jataka story simply took up the tradition connected with Dandakāśanya just as it was prevalent at the time, and modified it to suit the purpose of the Jataka tale. So far as the version of it incorporated in the Sarabhangā Jataka itself is concerned, there are features in the Jataka which seem altogether borrowed, probably from the Brahmanical sources. We shall not labour the point any further, excepting to note that the region became a desert and perhaps subsequently overgrown with forests, and remained such from a comparatively early time. If, as the story of the Ramayana has it, it went back to the days of Yayāti himself, it remained so up to well within historical times, as we shall see presently. According to the Ramayana, Rama met Sarabhangā on the banks of the Godavari and on the outskirts of the forest. Just before Rama visited Sarabhangā, Indra came and paid him a visit and extended an invitation to him as the time had approached for him to leave the world. Soon after Rama's visit, Rishi Sarabhangā actually gave up life and went to heaven. It is clearly said that it was just on the outskirts of the forest. It is under direction from Sarabhangā that Rama travelled up the Godavari to settle down in the place Janasthāna, the actual spot being Panchavati, which is identified with Nasik. The actual Dandakāśanya therefore must have begun from the Godavari and extended southwards indefinitely if these authorities alone were our only source.

Passing on next, we may note what is said of the southern kingdom of Vidarbha in Kalidasa's drama, Malavikāgnimitra. The sene of the drama is laid at the headquarters of the viceroyalty of Malva where ruled Agnimitra, son of Pushyamitra, who usurped the empire of Magadha after putting to death its last ruler, Brihadratha. In the course of the story the heroine, a princess of Vidarbha, comes to the court as a fugitive, remains incognito for a long time, gets known ultimately and is married to no less a person than Agnimitra himself. The princess along with her brother had become exiles from the kingdom because of a war of succession. The settlement dictated by the victorious viceroy Agnimitra was that the kingdom should be divided between the two collateral claimants, and Yagnasena and Madhavasena should be appointed over the two respectively. Then follows the interesting settlement that the friendly Madhavasena, the brother of the princess was to be installed in that part of Vidarbha nearer to Malva, and the less friendly Yagnasena in the more distant portion, in accordance with the dictates of authorities in the Aithasasūtra, and the river Varada is indicated as marking the boundary between the two kingdoms. There again Vidarbha is the name of the kingdom. We have no indication as to the exact size of it at the time, and if we could presume what is stated in the Buddhist Jataka referred to already, we may have to take it that the Nizam's Dominions went into Vidarbha. It may have been included in both the parts or only in that of Yagnasena.

We have other sources of information, from which it is possible for us to mark the southern boundary more precisely. In the Tamil classics, reference is made to the Dandakāranya. The actual context in which the reference is made is in connection with some of the rulers of the western portion of Tamil India, the country along the Arabian Sea coast. Describing a chieftain by name Nannan, some of these poems say that his territory lay to the northward of the Chera kingdom proper, along the coast with a capital not far from Cannanore, called by a name equivalent to Saptasāila (Ehl-Kunram) the "hill of seven households." This is a place somewhere about 18 miles north-east of Cannanore. This territory took into it the Tulu country specifically (South Kanara), and farther north of this lay the land of Konkan, called in Tamil Konkanam (Tamil Kol-Kānam), the forest region wherein it is open to anybody to take whatever he liked, as its literal meaning. Undoubtedly this is what has come to be known as Konkan, which has been modified by the Sanskritists to suit the requirements of the language, into Konkanam. The whole kingdom of this chief Nannan is sometimes described as Konkanam, and in one place and by the early poets, it is described as gold producing country, the mountains wherein showing gold veins. The chieftain is described as one very wealthy, and holding in his treasury even some statues of gold. Beyond this lay what is called Dandaranyam in Tamil, which is the equivalent of the Sanskrit Dandaka, the affix ka in Sanskrit being a mere meaningless affix, which the Sanskritists called svārthe, that is, the addition of which does not alter the meaning of the word. So Danda and Dandaka are synonymous, and what is referred to as Dandaranyam in Tamil is what is known generally among Sanskritists as Dandakāraṇyam.

The period in which this chief flourished is referable to the early centuries of the Christian era, and the reference itself may be regarded as historical in point of character. That it is so, is confirmed from the following extract from the Periplus, the long book of Greek navigator of the first century A D. The date generally given is A D 78-80, "Beyond Barvagaza, the adjoining coast extends in a straight line from north to south, and so this region included Dachinabades for Dachanos in the language of the south means south. The inland country back from the coast towards the sea comprised many desert regions and great mountains, and all kinds of wild beasts, leopards, tigers, elephants, enormous serpents hyenas and baboons of many sorts, and many populous nations, as far as the Ganges." Having said that, he proceeds further, "Among the market towns of Dachinabades, there are two of special importance. Paithana, distant about 20 days' journey from Baryagaza, (Broach, from Sanskrit Bṛigukaccha), beyond which about ten days, journey east, there is another very great city Tagara. There are brought down to Baryagaza from these places by wagons and through great tracts without roads, from Paithan carnelian in great quantity, and from Tagara much common cloth, all kinds of miscellaneous and muslin cloth, and other merchandise bought there locally from the regions along the sea coast and the whole course to the end of Dimirica is 7,000 stadia. But the distance is greater to the coast country."

We need not go further except to note that in this description we find the coast region well-peopled and prosperous, the interior being in a comparatively wild state as yet. Again along the western borderland of the plateau, there were places of commercial importance, such as Paithan on the Godavari, and Tagara to the south-east of it on the borderland of hills close to the western border of H E H the Nizam's Dominions, as places from which quantities of goods were brought to Broach. The articles referred to as coming from Tagara are articles some of which at any rate must have come from the farther east, as far east as the coast itself. The country round Masulipatam was always noted for muslins of various kinds produced in the locality. This part of it is confirmed by the inscriptions of the early Andhras, which show a brisk commercial communication between the east and the west, as far east as Dhanyakataka in the Guntur District, and then eastern and main capital, along the road to Paithan, their western capital, and other provincial capitals in that particular region. While the country therefore had the reputation of being a forest country, not altogether uninhabited perhaps, but much overrun by forests, still there was communication between the east coast and the west through this forest country in the middle. Up till then, we may therefore take it that the country under the rule of His Exalted Highness was more or less a forest country with border regions, not merely agriculturally fertile, but even industrially prosperous. The traditional history of the land therefore shows that this part of the plateau of the Dakhan was without much of a history of its own.

Turning to really historical sources, we have to go back to the Mauryan period for the beginning of the history of the Nizam's Dominions. There again the first landmark is what we find stated in the Asoka inscriptions. Rock Edicts, Nos 2, 5 and 13 make references to the empire of Asoka and his neighbours. The Dakhan part is clearly referred to as under the empire, and it is only the states of the farther south that are referred to as among the border-land of the neighbouring states. These states are put on a footing with those of the Greek states in the west 6000 yojanas away. Asoka was himself viceroy of Malva with Ujjain for his capital, and the territory under the direct authority of the Mauryan empire certainly did extend to the Vindhya under Chandragupta. Among the southern states, these Edicts mention, Rishikas, and Pitenikas, the Andhrias, Pulindas and Savarias among the peoples under the authority of the empire. That statement coupled with what the self-same records say of the war against Kalinga being the only war of Asoka, leaves us in little doubt that the rest of the territory between the Vindhya and the southern borders must have been conquered before the days of Asoka. The only point in doubt is whether Chandragupta did it or his son Bindusara. It is a late Tibetan source that ascribes the conquest to Bindusara and Chanakya. That perhaps is possible, but would not make it positive that Chandragupta's authority did not extend into the Dakhan. Anyhow it is clear that Asoka's empire actually extended to the northern border of the present-day Mysore extending eastwards and westwards to the coast, Kaliyanpuri river in South Kanara marking the limits near the west coast, and perhaps the northern Pennai along the line of Nellore similarly marking the eastern border. There are edicts of Asoka in the north-eastern corner of the Chitaldurga District, three such edicts near each other being known as Biahmagiri, Siddhapura, and Jatangi Ramesvara Hill. Since then another of his Rock Edicts has been discovered at Maski in the Nizam's Dominions, the south-western part of it, and quite recently another at Gooti. Since we find these edicts only along the borders of the empire in other cases, we may presume that these were placed in the various localities, again to mark the border. That agrees very well with the conclusion we have come to inferentially from the statements in the edicts.

One question, however, would arise from out of this that relates to the whole of the Dakhan, and does not indicate clearly the part that the Nizam's Dominions played in the matter. The discovery of Asoka's edicts in Sopara, in the island of Bassein near Bombay, led to the inference that the southern viceroyalty of Svarnagiri must be looked for somewhere along the west coast. This has since been made unlikely by the discovery of the edict at Maski in a region where there is a place which might be regarded as the equivalent of Svarnagiri, and where there is evidence of considerable gold-working from very ancient times. Kanakagiri only two marches from the ruins of Hampi in Vijayanagar seems the place indicated. The edicts in Mysore were all addressed from the viceregal headquarters at Svarnagiri to a subordinate government called in Pali, Isila. Recent excavations seem to show Asokan remains not very far off, and this ultimately may turn out to be the headquarters of the smaller division, although the name Isila yet remains to be properly equated. This makes a part of the Nizam's Dominions, at any rate, a flourishing and populous centre even the headquarters of a viceroyalty.

The coming of the Andhra dynasty into power brings the Nizam's Dominions definitely into history. The western capital of the Andhra empire was at Paithan on the Godavari, a town in the Nizam's Dominions. It finds contemporary reference in the log book of the Greek sailor, the author of the Periplus, as an emporium together with another town Tagara, identified with Teri which is again in the Nizam's Dominions. The great trunk road from the District of Guntur, reaching the coast, to Masulipatam at the mouth of the Krishna, threaded its way through the Nizam's Dominions, rather perhaps more to the south than in more recent times when the roadway between Masulipatam and Surat actually passed through the town of Hyderabad. The references in the Puranas and in the Tamil classics would perhaps make a part of the country forest, and considerable portions of it must have been brought into civilisation, and must have thriven prosperously to justify the statements regarding commercial products coming from the interior. In the first two centuries of the Christian era therefore the Nizam's Dominions constituted perhaps the principal block of territory in the Andhra empire.

When that empire passed out of existence and broke up into a large number of smaller territorial divisions, the part called now-a-days the Nizam's Dominions does not actually figure as any one division. But the dynasty that sprang into importance from out of this period of confusion is the dynasty of the Vākātakas. Our ideas are not quite clear in respect of the origin of this dynasty. When it first comes into light, it is described as a Vindhyan power, associated early with Bhojakata, which is only another form of Bhojakataka, as its capital. Bhojakataka and the more ancient city Kundinapura the capital of Vidarbha, have both been identified with ruins not far from Āmāvati in Berar. If that was the homeland of the founder, Vindhyasakti, his successor extended the territory far and wide. But the Puranic references as to this expansion give us details only in reference to the northward expansion. There is no specific indication of any place in the southward expansion of this power under this great ruler, Pravarasena. With his death the empire suffered, and revived in a comparatively small way under his grandson Rudrasena. His son and successor Prithivisena I was a great ruler, who extended the authority of the Vākātakas rather widely, and what is to our purpose, among the kingdoms included in his territory figures the state of Kuntala.

Kuntala is what is later described as Kainātaka, and must have occupied a considerable part of the territory of the Nizam's Dominions. Although the Vakātaka capital was in the Berars, under the successors following Prithivisena, the rulers get to be described as rulers of Kuntala, which would make them actually rulers of territory comprising within it the bulk of the Nizam's Dominions. Where we are able to trace actually the existence of territory under their control, we find the territory take in practically all of the Nizam's Dominions. Their feudatories, the Vishnukundins, held power in Vengi, and they could not have been feudatory to the Vākātakas unless the intervening territory also belonged to them. The dynasty of the Vakatakas therefore held sway over practically the whole of the Nizam's Dominions, and can be regarded as a Dakhan power. In the best period of Vākātaka rule therefore extending from the days of Prithivisena I to Pravarasena II, the Vakātakas may be regarded as a Dakhan power and as such essentially a state more or less corresponding to the Nizam's Dominions of to-day. At the outset of this power, the Samudragupta invasion swept like a wave along the east coast almost down to the region of Kanchi, and turned back from there towards the west, avoiding the block of territory comprised within the Nizam's Dominions of to-day. There could be only two inferences that could be drawn from the account of this invasion, and that is, that either the territory was under a ruler in alliance with Samudragupta, or that it still continued to be the desert tract of Dandakāranya, in a sense taken perhaps more literally than it ought to be for the period. The second inference is hardly possible at the time, and the positive statement in the Ajanta Cave Inscription that Prithivisena extended his authority over Kuntala, and the literary references to Pravarasena II as a Kuntala ruler, seem quite decisive in favour of the first.

As far as research work has gone at present, we seem to pass imperceptibly from the Vākātaka dominance over the Dakhan into that of Chalukyas. But then in Indian History these changes never came without a transition, and the transition is usually of the character of a reduction of the territory of a dominant power into its units generally in the shape of component kingdoms or chieftaincies. Between the two great kingdoms or empires, we always find these smaller states rapidly forming, and then reforming into an empire. This alternate union and break up of petty kingdoms, strikes a general historian as the rise and fall of dynasties, or dynastic powers. The territory comprised within the Nizam's Dominions seem to have been divided among three powers, it may be more, when the Chalukyas came into importance. The Kadambas in the south and south-west taking into their territory perhaps what was known as Kuntala or the best part of it, or more correctly recovering lost territory by a revival of their power. The farther north, the coast region, seems to have gone into the possession of the Mauryas with their capital at Sopara in northern Konkan. How far it actually extended into the interior we cannot say precisely, but we may be sure that a part of the present-day Nizam's Dominions was included in it. The greater part of the rest, particularly on the western and south-western side went into the territory of the Nalas, another tribe which figured among the early conquests of the Chalukyas. Over this transition comes into prominence the Chalukya power, and the establishment of the Chalukyas into a position of predominance takes two or three generations of work for its actual achievement. The early Chalukyas were a power which certainly held the territory of the Nizam's Dominions of the present-day at least the greater part of it, but we cannot regard it as a kingdom corresponding to the present-day Nizam's Dominions, as their capital lay outside, and with it the centre of power also may be said to have been rather more in the Southern Mahratta country in the Bombay Presidency than in the Nizam's Dominions. But this may be said in regard to them. They come into notice in that part of the Nizam's Dominions, in which an early dynasty recently brought to light by discoveries in Nagarjunikonda is said to have ruled. Nagarjunikonda was a place not far from the south-eastern frontier of the Nizam's Dominions. The block of territory extending northwards from the river Krishna and taking into it the Circars districts of the Madras Presidency and the eastern part of the Nizam's Dominions, was the kingdom of this dynasty which claims to have come from Ayodhya, and to have belonged to the race of Ikshvākus. As the Chalukyas claim similarly to have come from Ayodhya, though rather late in their history, and as they seem to emerge into importance from almost the same region, we may take it that there probably was some connection between Aikshvākavās, the descendants of Ikshvaku, who succeeded the Andhras and the Chalukyas who came into prominence in the sixth century A.D. The Chalukyas afterwards divided into two branches, the eastern and the western, and took the whole of the Nizam's Dominions between them. In that sense, the Chalukyas may be regarded as a power of the Dakhan as we understand the term. From about the middle of the sixth century to just past the middle of the eighth, they held sway over the whole of this region, fighting constantly against the Pallavas to keep them without the frontier of the Tungabhadra, the region between that and the Krishna having thus become then alone the debatable frontier, as it has always been in more recent Indian History. The Chalukyas may be regarded as a great power, and their greatest ruler Pulikesin exercised authority over the whole of the Dakhan, and proved the equal, if not the superior, of the emperor, Harsha of Kanauj in the north, his contemporary, whom he compelled to limit his advance at the Vindhya mountains. Hiuen T'sang's account of him is that of a very great ruler, whose authority, and beyond authority, his influence, extended widely. He sent an embassy to the great Persian ruler Khursu II, and received a return embassy from him, and one of the Ajantá frescoes has been taken to represent the receipt of this mission, although the identification has been called in question in recent times.

When we pass out of the dominance of the Chalukyas, we come to a dynasty, which may readily be claimed to be a native dynasty of the present-day Nizam's Dominions. The more so with their capital which, ever since they had achieved an important position, lay within the Nizam's Dominions, and their authority extended over the whole area of it during the period of their dominance of very near two centuries and a quarter.

The Rāshtrakutas, as the dynasty is generally called, came to power in the middle of the 8th century after subverting the rule of the Chalukyas, generally described by historians as the Chalukyas of Badami, or early Chalukyas, to distinguish them from another dynasty which claimed descent from them, and which ruled from a capital at Kalyani. Hence they were known as the Chalukyas of Kalyani. These are also described as the early Chalukyas and later Chalukyas respectively. We must also remember to distinguish them from the Chalukyas that ruled over the east coast region. These used therefore to be called Western Chalukyas, both the early and the later dynasties. Somewhere about A.D. 754 a Rāshtrakuta chieftain, somewhere about the eastern part of the Chalukya territory of those days, rose sufficiently into importance to marry a Chalukya princess. The son of this marriage improved the petty principality over which he ruled, and by openly throwing off his allegiance to the ruling dynasty acquired possession of the southern part of the territory in alliance with the Pallavas, and by gradually extending his power northwards became master of the bulk of the Chalukya territory in the middle, and ultimately attacked and overthrew the last scion of the imperial Chalukya family and set himself up as the supreme ruler of the Dakhan instead. This ruler is known to historians by his name Dantidurga, even by his title Viramegha, in which style he is referred to by a contemporary writer, Tiruman-gai Alvar. Thus was founded the dynasty of the Rāshtrakutas.

From the days of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa rulers of the Dakhan used to be styled Bhoja, and in the description of the Mahabhiseka of Indra it is stated clearly that Indra was annointed supreme ruler of the south under the designation Mahabhoja, as was customary. The term Bhoja therefore stood for a ruler, literally one that enjoyed a particular piece of land or country. That the term was in general use, we know from certain Andhra inscriptions which refer to village officers as "Gama Gama Bhojakas," officers appointed over each single village. It is a mere extension of the term to higher gradations to describe governors as Bhojas and Mahabhojas ultimately, and the rulers of Vidarbha have always been Bhojas, and the family of Bhojas held rule not only there, but in various other places as well. A similar official designation is that of the Rashtraka, the Ristika of the Asokan inscriptions. Rashtra is of course a division, and Rashtrika is ruler over the division. The term Rashtrika seems to be used almost synonymously with the name ruler or king, as one class of states or people are described as Arashtrakas or Arattas because they were people who carried on their administration without a Rashtraka that is an individual ruler. The term came later on to be used in Tamil in the Piakrit form Arattan, one who would not recognise a suzerain ruler. So Rashtrika, and Piakrit Ristika, would mean no more than the governor of a small province, as distinct perhaps from a kingly or royal ruler. There was a higher title the Maharatti or Maharashtraka corresponding to the Mahabhoja. We have references to this in earlier inscriptions, an illuminating example of which we get in the designation of the father of the early Sātavāhana queen Nāganikā whose father is called Maharati Kalalayo in the coins and even in the inscriptions relating to him. So Ratta and Maharatta, respectively Rashtraka and Maha Rashtraka, were official designations, perhaps hereditary like Desais, Despandes and Deshmukhs of the history of a later period. The term Rashtrakuta therefore may mean the most prominent among the Rashtrakas or Rashtriyas, Rattikas being in more popular use. Once the dynasty established itself in importance, their collaterals called themselves Rashtrakutas as well, and we come across records of a number of these families which held rule in various parts of the country. One of the families of these local rulers it is that gradually became sufficiently important to contract a marriage alliance with the imperial family at the time, and thus paved its way to an imperial position. The founder's was a short rule of about three years, A D 754-757. For some reason or other, he became unpopular, and his position was taken by his uncle known by the name Krishna, designated Krishna I to distinguish him from two successors of the name. It was he who finally overthrew the Chālukyās and set up the Rāshtrakuta power more or less definitely. These early rulers seem to have had their capitals not mentioned anywhere specifically. The greatest achievement of Krishna in the realm of peace is the cutting out of the wonderful temple, the Kailasa temple at Ellora in the Nizam's Dominions. He was succeeded by two sons of his. The first ruled only for a short time and made himself sufficiently odious for his younger brother to take over the authority from him. This latter ruler is known by the name Dhruva, who played an important part. It was about this time, the last quarter of the 8th century, that a new disposition of powers was taking place all over India.

For a little over a century previous, an imperial power in the north of Hindustan had become an impossibility. When the emperor Harsha died, there was a usurpation, and what is more a disintegration of the empire. The usurper of one part of the territory drew down upon himself the wrath of China, which at the time was in alliance both with Tibet and Nepal. The usurper was defeated and taken prisoner to China, and that part of India was left to govern itself. The contemporary ruler of Magadha gradually worked his way up to assert his claims to imperial authority over Hindustan. This was the Gupta ruler Adityasena, the son of Harsha's viceroy in Magadha. For some reason or other, which we do not know exactly, the ascendancy that he established does not appear to have lasted much beyond his reign. Another dynasty took its place, this time a dynasty which ruled in Kanauj. This made a similar effort, but before the effort could succeed, an enterprising ruler of Kashmir broke out from his seclusion and contested the claim to supremacy with the ruler of Kanauj. Now the threat of the advancing power of the Arabs across the the north-western frontier and the frontier of Sind on the one side, and of the vastly growing power of the Tibetans in the north, led these rulers to come to terms, and carry on till about the middle of the eighth century. But Kashmir had to draw back into its own frontiers, and the dominance of Kanauj ceased. The power of Kanauj showed signs of decay, and that was the occasion for frontier powers to assert their position and essay the establishment of an empire. At this period three powers stood forth, viz., the Gurjaras of Rajaputana, the region that came to be known afterwards as the Savalāk (Sapatalaksha country), with their capital probably at Bhinmal or Siim-Mal. Simultaneously Bengal lifted itself from anarchy by the people electing a certain Pala prince, by name Gopala, who could rule over Bengal. He gradually consolidated his position by creating a larger Bengal, and from there his successor made his advances to take as much of the territory of Kanauj as he possibly could lay hands on. It was a question therefore of who was to be master of Kanauj, the Gurjaras of the West, or the Bengalees of the East. Either because one or the other of the two parties asked their assistance, or because the invitation came from Kanauj, the Rashttrakutas now found their opportunity for effective intervention. It was the Rashttrakuta Dhruva who took the tide at the flood, and advanced northwards with telling effect, conquering the region of Gujarat and bringing the ruler of Malva under his influence. With intervention began that triangular equipoise between the Gurjaras, the Palas and the Rashtrakutas all alike exerting themselves to establish their influence over what was the empire of Kanauj, and thus achieve an imperial position. The result of this triangular struggle ended in the establishment of the imperial power of the Gurjaras, in spite of the fact that the Rashtrakutas intervened with decisive effect on two occasions, once in the early 9th century and another time in the 10th century. The Palas of Bengal consolidated their power in Bengal itself and gave up their effort at an imperial position.

The chief share of the distinction in achieving this high position for the Rashtrakutas must be given to Govinda III, the son of Dhruva, who constituted the province of Lāta or Gujarat, and appointed over it a brother of his by name Indira. He definitely brought Malva into subordination to the Rashtrakutas, and carried the war even into the territory of the Doab, thus continuing effectively what his father Dhruva had begun. It was in his reign probably that the foundations of the later capital Malkhed, in the heart of the Nizam's Dominions now, was laid. One great achievement which inscriptions ascribe to Govinda is his compelling his eastern Chalukya contemporary Vijayaditya, better known by his title Narendira Mrigaraja, to assist in the building of the wall of the new fortress of the capital city that he was thus engaged in building. It is by this capital city that these rulers were known to foreigners. The early Muhammadan historians beginning with Sulaiman refer to these rulers generally as the Balhara, which is the Prakritised form of a title, which the rulers of this dynasty, as well as their Chalukya predecessors, affected, viz, Vallabha, a contracted form of Prithivi-Vallabha (the beloved of the earth). This would mean beloved of the earth, a formal expression which the Hindus much affected in describing particularly popular sovereigns. This Vallabha assumes the Prakrit and Kannada form Ballaha, which the Arabs corrupted into Balhara. The successors of Sulaiman mention the Balhara and the ruler of Gurz, Gurjaras, as the two rulers of India, and, among them, they gave the palm to the Balhara. They mention him among the four great rulers of the then known world, viz, the Khalif, the ruler of Rum, the ruler of China and the Balhara making up the fourth. Govinda's successor was the famous Nripatunga or Amoghavarsha, who had a long reign of 64 years. He consolidated the position acquired by his father, and made his influence extensively felt. Rashtrakuta influence was felt all over the country from the banks of the Ganges almost down to the banks of the Kaveri. He was a Jain by persuasion, and was a great patron of letters. Jain literature and Jain scholars particularly, flourished in his reign, and some of the first names among these were the contemporaries of Amoghavarsha Nripatunga. His patronage extended equally to Sanskrit and Kannada, in the latter of which his is a great name.

also. The empire lasted till late in the 10th century when it was in its turn overthrown by a scion of the superseded Chalukya family, who took advantage of the struggle both in the north and in the south, with which the Rashtrakutas encumbered themselves, particularly with rising power of Malva.

This put an end to the dynasty in 972, and the later Chalukyas of Kalyani established themselves in their stead. The establishment of the Gujara empire in Hindustan definitely set a term to Rashtrakutas advance in the north, and, under the last great successor of Amoghavarsha by name Krishna III, early in the 10th century, the Rashtrakutas advanced southwards into the territory of the rising power of the Cholas, and even definitely occupied the northern districts of the newly rising power after inflicting a crushing defeat upon the Chola heir-apparent in A.D. 949. The Rashtrakuta empire lasted hardly 25 years longer, the length of a single generation though actually taken up by three or four rapidly succeeding reigns. The vast extension of authority coupled with the rise of a new powerful dynasty in Malva under the Paramaras brought about the weakening of the Rashtrakuta power, which was taken advantage of by the feudatory Chalukya under Taila II to establish himself in the place of the Rashtrakutas. Thus was founded the dynasty of the later Chalukyas.

Taila or Tailapa II was the ruler who subverted the Rashtrakutas in A.D. 972. Later rulers of this dynasty give themselves a genealogy connecting them with the early Chalukyas. The genealogy does not prove itself to be quite satisfactory, and gives us clearly to understand that after their overthrow in the middle of the 8th century, they had been reduced to a position of no consequence till the rise of Tailapa to the new position, and while members of this family may have lived on continuously, we have no definite knowledge of the family as in existence, or of the line of succession. It is, however, a matter of no great consequence to history. The war against Malva had begun even before the usurpation, and in fact the usurpation was made possible by the vigorous attacks of the Malva rulers. This we can understand as the Rashtrakutas claimed a sort of overlordship over Malva from the days of Dhruva and Govinda. It was merely the effort on the part of the newly established dynasty of Malva to shake off the yoke. The war would therefore have been more bitter than usual, and the weakness of the successors of Krishna III easily lent itself to the usurpation. The usurper however became heir to the war along with the territory. Taila had the good luck to inflict a crushing defeat upon the successor of the first important ruler of Malva, Siyaka Harsha. His younger brother Munja carried on 16 successful invasions of Chalukya territory. He was defeated in the last invasion and was thrown into prison. He was put to death ignominiously as a common felon, as he made an effort to escape from confinement with partial success. The war continued under the greatest of the Paramaras of Malva, Bhoja, and the two successors of Tailapa himself. The misfortune that befell the Rashtrakutes, and the war along the northern frontier which absorbed the attention of their successors gave the opportunity for the Cholas to reassert their authority and rectify their frontier by advancing northwards. The year of the Chalukya usurpation also happens to be the year when the greatest ruler of the Chola dynasty came into prominence although for the time he left the collateral member of the family, an uncle, succeeded to the throne, himself playing a subordinate role as heir-apparent. This is Rajaraja, the Great, of the Chola dynasty of Tanjore. The third ruler from Taila was Jayasimha, in whose time the Malva war sank into a subordinate position, and simultaneously began the battle royal between the Cholas and the Chalukyas which lasted the whole of the eleventh century, and came to an end only in the reign—and that late in the reign of the great Chalukya Vikramaditya VI. Somesvara, Great in war (Ahavamalla), was the ruler whose contribution to the Chalukya empire was the keeping back of the rising tide of Chola aggression, which, through the previous reign had been gradually gaining in power and soon getting to be irresistible. Through a long reign from A.D. 1044 to 1069 Somesvara was engaged in constant effort to keep this rising Chola tide within bounds. The Cholas had by now advanced across the tableland of Mysore taking into their territory the Gangavadi 96,000, and what was a regular frontier region through the middle of Mysore diagonally from the south-west and along the Tungabadra till it joined the Krishna. All along this long frontier they had to fight. There seem to have been several capitals of this dynasty under the early rulers. Malkhed probably continued still to be the actual capital, although other capitals are spoken of, a number of them. Among them, places of importance, which figure often in Chola inscriptions, Kollipakkai, the Kulpak of modern times not very far from Hyderabad and Secunderabad. A series of fortified places are mentioned along the frontier extending westwards from Kulpak, and various battles had been fought along this frontier in the reign of Somesvara, the Ahavamalla, the father, his son and successor, Somesvara, the Bhulokamalla. Vikramaditya, the younger brother of Somesvara II who ascended the throne by setting aside his elder brother entered into an alliance with the Cholas, and, taking advantage of it, overthrew his brother and ascended the throne. This gave a certain amount of respite, but a revolution in the Chola empire immediately after made the peace comparatively shortlived. It is after almost a generation of war that the two great usurers, the Chola and the Chalukya, learnt to respect each other and their frontier, and came to something like a definite understanding. The chronic wars then ceased. Vikramaditya had a long reign of fifty years, A.D. 1078 to 1127, and his reign marks the most glorious period of Chalukya rule It was under his father Somesvara that the capital was changed from Malkhed, and perhaps even Yadgir to Kalyani, all the three places in the Nizam's Dominions. A number of other capitals also could be mentioned in the Nizam's Dominions while there were others besides outside the limits of his Exalted Highness' territory. Notwithstanding the wars against the Cholas, he was able so far to rule in peace that practically the whole of his long reign may be considered one of peace and prosperity. He was a great patron of letters. The remarkable names in Sanskrit literature may be mentioned, one the famous poet Bilhana, who wrote a history of Vikramaditya known as the Vikramankadeva-charitam. The other is the great Hindu commentator Vijnanesvara, the author of the Mitakshara, whose commentary is the authoritative text-book of law for the south. His successor, a son was a man of accomplishment, but seemed to have proved a weak ruler.

With him began the decay of the Chalukyan empire, which again suffered a usurpation in the middle of the 12th century when one of the governors of the empire took over the authority from another ruler by name Taila. The actual capital continued to be still Kalyani, and this usurper is known by the name Bijjala, and three of his sons continued to rule one after another. But the total period was well within about thirty years when the usurper dynasty was overthrown, and a scion of the later Chalukyas was restored to his legitimate position. The usurper Bijjala's reign was of great importance, as it was then that a Saiva movement took shape in the form in which it is prevalent to-day, the Virasaiva or the Lingayat movement. But otherwise his rule was one of vigour, and he managed to keep the provinces under control. The restoration of the Chalukyan dynasty was of short duration, and in less than a decade the ruler passes out of view, and the empire breaks up into a number of kingdoms. Three great families, and a number of smaller ones, divide the territory among them, and the period from then onward to the Muhammadan invasions is a period of the rule of the feudatory dynasties. Even the dynastic rulers come into view as powerful supporters of the empire in the reign of Jayasimha, and even earlier. They were under Vikramaditya VI, pillars of the empire, and when the empire grew weaker and weaker after the usurpation, they became more or less independent. Three families stood out most prominently, the Yadavas of Devagiri with Sinnai or Junnai, first of all as their capital, and Devagiri afterwards, the Kakatiyas of Anamkonda, and then Warangal, and the Hoysalas of Dvarasamudra. There were half a dozen other chieftains of minor degree owing allegiance to one or other of these but these set about dividing the territory of the empire among themselves practically. Of these the Kakatiyas of Warangal were a dynasty whose territory lay over the greater part in the Nizam's Dominions, and whose capitals Anamkonda and Warangal alike are situated in the heart of this territory. After they established themselves in independence a succession of five or six rulers continue, among them a woman. The rule of Ganapati, of his successor Rudramba and that of the last of them, Prataparudra II, were reigns of very considerable importance and great prosperity. It was under Prataparudra that the first Muhammadan invasion of Warangal took place under Alla-ud-din and the dynasty was put an end to after a series of raids by one of the invasions of Muhammad bin Tughlak in 1323, or thereabouts.

This in brief, and in general outline, is the survey of pre-Musalman history of the Dakhan. The best way of rousing interest in the history of the territory would be to give a general conspectus of history. The object is to rouse a certain amount of interest in the history of the region, so that a certain amount of local investigation and reconstruction of the past may be attempted as original work by interested students of the history. It is also one of the usual educational methods to take advantage of the natural interest that people have in their homeland, by gradually widening the horizon extend the interest to a larger field, thus drive home knowledge of the subject in general. If this conspectus should evoke some interest in the people of the region to know more, and, to know more generally of the history of India, the address would have served its purpose wonderfully well.

The Coin of Gautamiputra Sri Satakarni

BY

THE surface of Satavāhana numismatics has been ruffled by two finds—a large hoard of 1500 coins in the Akola Dt and² that of two rectangular copper coins of a Sirisādhavāhana. The former establishes the virtual accuracy of the Puranic Lists of the later Sātavāhanas, just as the Nāneghāt relievo inscriptions establish the veracity of the Puranic Lists of early ones. The Sri-Sātavāhana coins which were purchased by Advocate Joglekar of Poona at Aurangabad are very unique. The other known Sātavāhana coins present one common feature in the midst of their Gupta like variety—the dynastic name sometimes used in the inscription is not found on the coins. That these two pieces are the coins of the first king Simuka Sātavāhana, there can be no doubt either on palaeographical or on numismatic or on nomenclature grounds. The other Sātavāhana of the Nāneghāt records died a prince. I cannot agree with Mr Joglekar that Sātavāhana was the personal name of the first king and that it later on became the dynastic name, for in the Nāsik inscription Kanha the brother of Simuka is said to have belonged to the Sādavāhanakula.

The coin of Gotamiputra Sri-Satakarni is another important find. It was given to me for examination by Mr Joglekar and was also purchased at Aurangabad. It is a round point coin, 95" in diameter and 2282 gis. in weight. On the obverse is an elephant with the trunk hanging down and standing right. On its back at the extreme left can be dimly discerned a rider. Below the elephant are two wavy lines representing river¹. It is the most graceful representation of the elephant walking on the known Sātavāhana coins. On the reverse are found a small Ujjain symbol, a swastika enclosed by a short cross-like symbol, half blundered into this is a cariya of three tiers surmounted by a crescent and a dot—a common feature on many of the Sātavāhana coins. To the left of the swastika there is the taurine symbol.

(rā) ñ (o) Goto (a) mip (u) tasa

1 The symbol of a river with fish swimming is found on the early Satavahana coins picked up in western India

In view of the fact that there is no independent coin of certain attribution to Gotamīputa Sīri-Sātakani 24th in the Puranic List and the conqueror of Nahapāna has been found we may be tempted to treat the legends as partial and ascribe them to Gotamīputa Sīri-Yāña Sātakani 28th in the Puranic Lists whose coins have been picked up in large numbers in western India, the Central provinces and in the Andhradesa² But on various grounds its ascription to Gotamīputa Sīri Sātakani is more fitting.

1. On the numerous Sīri-Yāña coins presenting a variety of types, we have elephant with trunk upraised, horse, caitya and the elephant standing (Rapson No 164), but nowhere do we come across elephant walking. On coins conjecturally attributed by Rapson to Gotamīputa Sātakani on numismatic and palaeographical grounds, we have elephant walking (Rapson Catalogue Pl IV, No 64)

2. On all the Sīri Yāña coins from either the Āndhradesa or the Chanda Dt each orb of the Ujjain symbol is represented by a pellet with a surrounding circle. On the coin under reference there is no pellet.

3. On no coin of Sīri-Yāña is the present reverse combination of Caitya, Ujjain symbol and swastika found

4. There is also no space on the obverse for the legends. Yāña coins has angles Ga of the former with longer arms is certainly earlier. Pa of Gotamīputa Sīri-Sātakani is less angular than that of the Yāña coins. Ta of the coins of Yāña has a loop.

In short palaeography stamps the coin under reference as earlier than the Yāña coin. The only Gotamīputa immediately earlier to Sīri-Yāña is Gotamīputa Sīri-Sātakani 24th in the Puranic List, the conqueror of Nahapāna, the reviver of the Sātavāhana glories and the subject of the funeral oration of Gotamī Balasiri as recorded in the Nasik ins. of the time Pulīmāyī

² Except for the Sīri Sātakani coins of the Akola hoard and some coins picked up in western Deccan and both conjecturally attributed to Gotamīputa Sīri Sātakani we have no independent coin of this king

AN INSCRIPTION FROM GUNTUR.

BY

K. GOPALACHARI, M.A., PH.D

PROFESSOR OF HISTORY, S. P. COLLEGE, POONA.

THE inscription which is on a stone slab and is much mutilated and defaced was found in Chezarla, a village in the Tenālī taluq of the Guntūr Dt. The language is Sanskrit though the inscription begins with the Prakrit word kalissara. The characters are of early south Indian type. On palaeographical grounds the ins. may be assigned to the sixth cen. A.D. It records the grant of a village by a Prthivīyuvārāja who is extolled in a long string of laudatory epithets many of which relate to his strength and prowess on the battlefield. The name of the donee and other details about the grant are lost in the midst of the mutilated passages. The Prthivīyuvārāja is only known by his surnames, Ranamahāmalla and Satsabhāmalla. It is further said that he was born of king Kandaras's daughter and that his army fought a battle at Dhānyakataka. He was a worshipper of Parameswara.

King Kandaras is styled Sūtarabennānatha and Trikūṭaparvatapati. The practice of singling out place names in this way was prevalent in the Sātavāhana period also. Sūtarabennā is Kṛsnabennā, and all the records of the Kandaras have been found in the Guntūr Dt. The identification of Trikūṭaparvata is not so easy. In his Buddhist Remains in the Andhradesa Dr. K. R. Subramaniam connects this Trikūṭa with that of the Kadambas. True any three peaked hill may be called Trikūṭa. The Nāsik hill is called Tiranhu. In the Rāmāyana it is said that Lanka was built on Trikūṭa. But in the Ipūr plates of Madhavarmān II he is called Trikūṭa-Malayadhīpati. This joint mention of Trikūṭa and Malaya should dispose any attempt to identify the Trikūṭa of these records with any three-peaked hill in the eastern Deccan. Malaya which is also mentioned in Nāsik No. 2 is the Western Ghāts. In Kalidasa's Raghuvamśa, mountain Trikūṭa, from which the designation Traikūṭaka must be derived, is placed in the territory of the king of 'Aparānta' (N. Konkan), and the Surat plates of Vyāghrasena, a Traikutaka, claims to have ruled over Aparānta. While editing the Ipūr plates, Dr. Hultzach passed over the epithet, Trikūta Malayadhipati with the remark that Mādhavavarman claimed to have been lord of Tr'kūta and Malaya (mountain) which were at a safe distance from his dominions. Is it an empty or ornamental epithet suddenly making its appearance in only one of the Visnukundin records? In Nāsik No. 2 Gotami-puta Sirī-Sātakanī is called Vijha-Charata-Paricata-Sahya-Kanhagiri-Mala-Sritana-Malaya-Mahida-Setagiri-Cakora-Pavatapati. Surely these are not empty epithets. How could Mādhavavarman or Kandara have got the titles even though their dominions were at a safe distance from their dominions? We get the clue from a Vākātaka ins. Verse 8 records the defeat of a lord of Kuntala by apparently Prthivisena and in verse 18 speaks of Kuntala, Avantī, Kalinga, Kosala, Trikutā and Lāta and Āndhra as having been subjugated by one of the latter Vākātakas. At that time the Visnukundins were the Āndhra power. Such defeats would have been repaid and the outcome of such prolonged hostilities must have been the marriage alliance referred to in the Chikkulla plates of Vikramahendravarmān. The defeat which the Visnukundin inflicted on the Vākātakas must have provided for the former the for occasion for taking over the latter's titles or glories. The Kandaras would by defeating the Visnukundins with or without the help of the Pallavas got the title or glory for themselves. This is the most probable explanation and the Chezarla ins. refers to a hard fought battle at Dhanyakataka.

It is also interesting to note that the queen of king kandara is called an Āndhrasundarī and that Kandara was the king of a kingdom with two divisions or the king of two kingdoms. Since all the records of the Kandaras come only from the Guntur Dt. the former explanation is preferable.

2 Who is the Prthivyavarāja of this inscription only his surname 'Ranamahāmalla' is given. Prthivī-yuvarāja reminds us of Prthivīvallabha and Prthivībharāja of the Koppam plates of Pulakesin II's time. But the inscription under review is not a Cālukyan inscription as the family name and some epithets which are invariably found in the Cālukyan records are absent though we have the word Srikuṭa Malla ending in the surname shows without doubt that it is a Pallava inscription. The sculptures of the Vaikunthaperumal temple at Kāñci supply additional proof. One of the compartments mentions Sīmaḷa, Ranamalla, Sangrāmamalla, and Pallavamalla as Hīranayavarman's four sons. Compartment I mentions Hīranayavarman and Parameśa-varavaraman II (beginning of the 8th cen.).

The Rānāmahāmalla of our ins cannot be the Ranamalla of the Kāñci ins as king-Kandara cannot be shifted to such a late date. Moreover surnames are not the monopoly of one sovereign. Moreover the title of yuvarāja was known to the earliest Pallavas. The Practice of registering the surnames of the ruling prince was apparently begun by Mahendravarman I (Satrumalla) and became popular during the time of Narasiṃhavarman II (Rājasiṃha).

The Pallava Prince is called Prathitānprthwīyuvarajah. Prathitān Prthwīyuvarājah gives no sense. Can it be a scribal error for prathitāndraprthwīyuvarajah? He would then be a Pallava prince who was viceroy of the Andhra deśa.

BUDDHISM IN THE DECCAN

BY

PROF S HANUMANTH RAO, M A,
(NIZAM COLLEGE HYDERABAD-DN)

THE great revival of interest in Buddhism in recent times, is due in no small measure to the magnificent patronage bestowed by H. E. H. the Nizam's Government, for the preservation of the Buddhist monuments, sculptures and paintings at Ajanta, Ellora and other places in the State Gautama Buddha, the founder of Buddhism was a historical personality, who lived between 563 and 483 B C. It is not certain, whether Buddha travelled in the Deccan. There is, however, no doubt, that from about the beginning of the 3rd Century B C. Buddhism received the patronage of the Deccan rulers and for about six hundred years, flourished side by side with Jainism and Hinduism. Buddhism was not a revolt against Brahminism. It was only an expansion of the Brahmanic teaching of the Vedas and the Upanishads. The essence of the Upanishadic teaching was not to preach negation of life. A life of strenuous activity devoid of attachment was taught by the Upanishads and Buddha's mission, as pointed out by Sir Radhakrishnan, was to accept the idealism of the Upanishads at its best and make it available for the daily needs of mankind.

Asoka the Great (273-232 B C)

It was the patronage of Emperor Asoka that transformed Buddhism from a small sect to one of the world religions. Asoka deserves to be classed among the pioneers of the movement for world peace. In his edicts, he proclaimed that "True conquest is conquest not over men's bodies but over their hearts and wills, that fine glory or fame does not depend upon the extent of one's dominions but upon the moral progress he can help his people to achieve".

Buddhism had spread in the Deccan by the time of the Asoka. Asokan inscriptions have been discovered at Maski in the Raichur District and at Gavimath and Phalkigundu, two hills near Kopbal, 21 miles from Hampi-Vizianagar. They prove beyond doubt the extension of Asoka's dominions in the Deccan. Maski is identified with Suvarnagiri or Gold Mount, the headquarters of Asoka's Viceroy in the Deccan. The Asokan inscriptions mentioned only the titles of Asoka, viz Devanam Piya or Piya Darsi, "The beloved of the Gods or gracious looking" The Maski inscription is a unique contribution to Asokan scholarship, in that it mentions Asoka by name, as the author of the edict. One of the two inscriptions at Kopbalis is complete and all its letters are legible. Buddhism spreads sweetness and light to the lowly and the disinherited. The inscriptions proclaim, "This cannot be obtained by only a great man on the other hand by a lowly man acting zealously wide heaven also can be obtained. And for this matter this proclamation that both the lowly and the exalted may act zealously and the borderers also may know and zealous action may be long lasting and this matter shall grow and shall grow wide and shall grow half as much again"

By the 6th century A D both Hinduism and Buddhism observed foreign elements and the Bhagawatha Purana bears evidence to the synthesis of cultures and the recognition given to the different racial factors in the country in a verse, which bears comparison to the famous edicts of Asoka, (2-4-18) —

"I bow to the almighty Lord by adoring whose devotees, low class people such as Kiratas, Hunas, Andhras, Pulindas, Pulkasas, Abhiras, Kamkas, Yavanas and Sakas, as well as high class people who have fallen into sin become absolved"

The edicts of Asoka, as well as the verses in Bhagawatha indicate a great revolution in thought, constituting an epoch in the development of Freedom of mind. A modern parallel is provided by the recent proclamation of the Maharajah of Travancore throwing open the public temples to all Hindus by birth or by conversion.

Early Buddhist Monuments

The sacred relics of Buddha were deposited in caskets and over them were erected Stupas or tombs. Later on, when caves were hewn out of rocks, Chaityas or halls were constructed, with a Stupa or Dagoba, containing the relics of Bhudha. If we compare the Chaitya to a Hindu temple, the Dagoba corresponds to the Garbha Griha, which contains the image of God or Goddess in a Hindu temple. Relic worship was not peculiar to the Buddhists. The medieval movement of Hindu Vaishnavism, especially in the Deccan, emphasised the importance of preserving the memory of their saints, by the construction of tombs or Brindavanas. The important shrine contains the bodily remains of the departed saint but bones or ashes may be carried to different places and shrines constructed, wherever the influence of the saint has spread. The tomb of Jayatirtha, a fourteenth century Vaishnava Saint of Malkhed, the tombs of the Vyasaraya and others at Anegondi are some of the most conspicuous. The Sikhs also worship the relics of their Gurus. The tomb at Nanded attracts Sikhs from all parts of India. Small miniature relic caskets in metal, containing the ashes gathered from those of the original tombs are kept in daily worship, by the followers of the respective saints. This is a form of saint-worship widely prevalent in the Deccan.

One of the epochmaking periods in the history of the Deccan, was the period between 230 B C and 230 A D. The dynasty of the Andra kings, held undisputed sway, from sea to sea, carried on active external trade with Roman Empire on the west and the islands of the Indian archipelago on the East. There was also brisk internal trade and the cities of Barygaza, Modern Broach, Sopara and Kaliana, near Bombay, Paithan or Pratishtana, Ter or Tagara Masalia, modern Masulipatam, obtained reputation outside India, and were made mention of by Ancient classical writers. The greatest legacy of the Andhra kings to the culture of India—nay even to the culture of the world—is all that is represented by the word Ajanta. One of the most famous Buddhist Stupas was constructed at Amaravathi or Dhanyakataka, near the frontier of the Hyderabad State, towards Bezvada. Some of the specimens of Amaravathi Sculpture, representing the life-story of Buddha are to be found deposited in the Hyderabad Museum. The greatest Buddhist philosopher of the second century A D. Nagarjuna, resided at Nagarjuna konda in the immediate neighbourhood of Amaravathi. I listened with great interest and profit to an interpretation of the sculptures at Nagarjunakonda, representing the life story of Buddha, at the Indian History Congress, held at Madras, last December. I consider, that a comparative study of the life story of Buddha as depicted in the paintings at Ajanta and the Sculptures at Nagarjuna konda, will be of great interest and value, to Students of Buddhist art and culture. The absorption of several foreign elements into Indian culture, largely due to the cosmopolitanism of Buddhism and its liberal influence on contemporary Hinduism, is illustrated by the examples of Heliodorus the Greek, who became a Parama Bhagawatha and the Indo-Greek king, Menander, who became the Buddhist, Milinda. The power of Menander, extended as far as Sindh, Kathiawar and portions of the Deccan. Like his great predecessor, Alexander, he had dreams of establishing cultural contacts between the East and the West.

The Vakataka kings, who held sway in the Deccan, for nearly two hundred years after the fall of the Andhras, from their Imperial position continued to patronise Buddhism in the Deccan and the caves of Ajanta, contain inscriptions of grants made by the Vakataka kings or their ministers.

The great Chalukya king, Pulakesi II, succeeded in preserving the integrity of the Deccan against the attempts made by Emperor Harsha to conquer the Deccan. Cultural contacts existed between Persia and the Deccan as early as the Seventh Century A.D. The Persian historian, Tabari of the 9th century A.D. gives a detailed account of the correspondence that passed between the Deccan king, Pulakesi and the Sassanian Monarch Khusru II. Among the gifts that were sent by Pulakesi, were an elephant, a sword, a white falcon and a piece of gold brocade. The famous Chinese pilgrim, Hieun Tsang visited Pulakesi's court and bore testimony to the patronage given to Brahminical as well as Buddhist learning by the Deccan king.

The Buddhist caves at Ajanta and Ellora.

Ajanta and Ellora were important centres of Buddhist influence in the Deccan for nearly a thousand years, from the 2nd century B.C. to the 10th century A.D. Ellora is situated north-west of the Hyderabad State and is 13 miles from Aurangabad. Ajanta is 55 miles from Aurangabad. There are 29 cave temples at Ajanta. They are hewn out of solid living rocks, in a semi-circular scrap, 250 feet high, extending for about 600 yards. From a distance, they appear like a succession of pillared verandahs. The spot chosen at Ajanta is the most appropriate for study and meditation. The scenery around is marvellous for its beauty and charm. The hills and rocks, the waters of the Waghora stream running down the valley, the luxurious foliage all round, especially after the rains in September, leave an unforgettable impression on one, who seeks peace and an escape, even for a short time, from the din and bustle of a busy world. An inscription in one of the caves at Ajanta, describes the place as a very auspicious and lovely one, "where pious persons adorned with excellent virtues have their residence." Nivasanti hi yatraiva Santah Sadguna bhushanah tam Mangalyam Manojam Ca.

Chaityas and Viharas

Amidst such surroundings were excavated the Chaityas and Viharas of the Buddhists. The Chaityas were halls for common worship and contained the Stupa or Dagoba, the domed shrine above the relics of Buddha. The Dagoba corresponds to the Garbha griha of the Hindu temple. The Viharas were lecture halls used by scholars and pilgrims with small apartments for the resident professors, the monks. They also contain shrines with huge sculptures of Buddha, in different postures of meditation.

The earliest Chaityas contain no image of Buddha. But in course of time, we find images of Buddha carved on the Dagoba. The only Chaitya cave at Ellora, known as the Viswa Karma cave contains a huge Dagoba with a seated Buddha 11 ft high. The pose of the legs is not the usual cross-legged form but what we may call "the European fashion", like the position occupied when seated on a chair. In one of the most elaborately carved Chaityas at Ajanta, cave 19, we find Buddha standing, within the arch in the dome. There is a seated Buddha above and on the top of the Stupa, there are the three umbrellas in stone, one above the other. In cave No. 26, Buddha is seated on a Lion throne. Lion thrones or Simhasanas made of metal are very commonly used, to the present day, as seats for household objects of worship, by the Hindus of the Deccan. Cave 19 belongs to the 6th century A D. and represents a great development of Mahayana sculpture. Cave 26 contains a beautiful figure of the dying Buddha, more than 23 feet long.

Of the Viharas, caves 1 and 2 belong to the 6th century A D. Cave 1 has a verandah 64 feet long, with a beautifully carved large door, leading to a hall 64 feet square. Both the Viharas contain sculptural representations of the Dhyanī Buddhas of colossal size.

The Paintings.

The Fresco paintings of Ajanta have acquired world-wide fame. The Archaeological Department of H. E. H. The Nizam's Government has spared no pains or expense in doing everything that is possible to preserve for future generations, the fragments that have survived climatic destruction.

The paintings at Ajanta represent not only the life story of Buddha but also scenes from the Jataka or birth stories of the Buddha in previous births. As Prof. Winternitz pointed out, many of these stories are not genuinely Buddhist. Many of them belong to the common property of Indian ascetic poetry. The Jataka stories illustrate the Buddhist Dharma. The Hindu Puranic stories illustrate the Bhagawatha Dharma. The most popular Jataka story is the Visvantara Jataka. It is as popular among the Buddhist as Ramayana is among the Hindus. In Tibet and Burma, it is dramatically represented and the audience shed tears. It is represented in Buddhist sculpture from Ceylon to Cambodia. The Visvantara Jataka teaches the Dharma of generosity. The mission of king Visvantara in life was, to give. His story strongly resembles that of king Harischandra who was generous to a fault. Similar is the story of king Bali in the Bhagawatha Purana. He was asked to give three paces of land. The whole earth was covered by the first, heaven was covered by the second and the king offered his head for the third pace and he thanks god that the loss of his kingdom brought him nearer to God. The details of the Visvantara story are well depicted in the Ajanta paintings.

Grousset describes Ajanta as a poem of Indian womanhood. The delineation of Queen Maya, in a standing position, at the time of the birth of Buddha is one of the best examples of the art of Ajanta. The great stress is given to emotion and fancy but unlike the sculptural representation at Palampet, the prominent note is spiritual and all idea of voluptuousness is avoided.

One of the most unforgettable paintings at Ajanta is that of the Mother and Child. Buddha appears before the palace gate, bowl in hand. Buddha's wife and child are offering alms. In one of the legends of Buddha, it is stated that Buddha as a mendicant was not recognised by his wife and to convince her that he is now an Enlightened one, he began to take a form larger and larger in size and enabled his wife and son to witness that vision. The legend has such a striking parallel to the Viswarupa Darsana given by Sri Krishna to Arjuna in the Bhagawat Gita.

One of the Ajanta paintings in cave 2 represents the Kshantivadi Jataka, very popular in all Buddhist lands. It is the story of the preacher of peace and patience. The Kshantivadi never loses his composure under the greatest pain and provocation. An angry king cuts off his limbs. There is an inscription on the painting which describes the state of mind of Kshantivadi, "And the joy which he experienced from giving left no space for the feeling of pain caused by cutting and continually prevented his mind from being plunged into grief." The teaching of the Kshantivadi conveyed through this inscription is a revised version of the Upanishadic teaching of the Isavasya—By doing actions, live a hundred years. The Bhagawatha Purana popularised this teaching of the Upanishads and that of the Buddha and the Bodhisattvas. Neither in the Upanishads nor in the teaching of the Buddha was there negation of activity. Everywhere the appeal is to creative activity and an integration of personality. The inscription on the Kshantivadi painting runs as follows:—"He who having obtained the blameless human state and being born in the full possession of organs and senses, sound and vigorous, without any defect, neglects to do good actions every day from lack of attention—such a one is much deceived—is he not subject to the necessity of death?" The Bhagawatha Purana presents a close parallel—"Having at the end of a long series of bodily existences obtained here this human body, not easily to be attained, capable of fruitful work, though perishable, the thoughtful man should soon endeavour, before it falls off, to attain to the highest good, on the other hand, the ordinary objects of senses may be had indeed everywhere (in every life)." "

The story of Prahlada, in the Bhagawatha Purana presents a close parallel to the story of the Kshantivadi. Prahlada was unmoved when trodden under the elephant's foot, thrown into fire, thrown down from the hill and made to drink poison.

Mahayana Buddhism included the worship of the Bodhisatwas, beings destined for enlightenment. Of the several Bodhisatwas, Avalokiteswara is characterised as the jewel of the Buddhist Church (Sangharatna). The painting of the great Bodhisatwa.—The Lord that looks down with infinite pity on all beings, Padmapani, lotus in hand, in cave 1 at Ajanta is considered to be one of the finest expressions of Indian art. He is represented as a charming prince, wearing a high, mace-shaped headdress standing in a very graceful pose. The figure bears a close resemblance to that of the dancing Krishna or Gita Nataraja.

The Dhyana sloka in the Sadhara-mala describes him as aged about twice eight years—and endowed with various auspicious marks. The mantra or prayer hymn which is the profound secret of Avalokiteswara is "Om Mani Padme Hum". The famous Chinese pilgrim Fa Hien, prayed to this Bodhisatwa for deliverance when he was overtaken by a storm, on the voyage from Ceylon to China.

Bhattacharya explains in his Buddhist iconography that Avalokiteswara is still supposed to work and foster spiritual knowledge amongst his fellow creatures. He is characterised as taking the shapes of all gods of all religions, nay, even the shape of father and mother in fact, the form of the worshipped of any and every worshippers to whom he may impart knowledge.

We find a very close parallel in the Bhagawatha Purana, where the teacher of Bhagawatha to king Parikshit is described as Sarva Bhuta Hridayam "who is in the inmost heart of all beings". The Dhyana sloka of Srisuka, the great Bhagawatha teacher describes him as "Dvyashta Varsham" twice eight years.

The painting of the great Bodhisatwa received superlative praise from every student of Indology. Grousset describes it as "a figure worthy of a place in the art of the world by the side of the sublimest incarnations of theistine chapel, or of such drawings as that of Christ for "the last supper," in which Leonardo Da Vinci has expressed the most intense emotions of the soul." Says Dr. Coomaraswami, "The great Bodhisatwa is perhaps the most impressive, perfectly realising the conception of one born by right of virtue to the enjoyment of all that the world can offer and yet preoccupied with the one ruling passion of compassion." Writes Mr. Yazdani, "The name and history of the artist who painted this wonderful subject will never be known but the fading fresco as long as it survives, will tell the story of the genius and skill of its author in most eloquent terms." The significance of the art of Ajanta is admirably expressed by Mr. Yazdani, "It is a vision of the living world that the artists of Ajanta represent, the teeming earth, the springing plants, the birds, the deer, the elephants, crimson pillared pavilions and porticoes, gateways and roofs of cities and among all these, the life of men, women and children, supple, limbed and gracious in gesture freely moving, playful or pensive in mood. all earthly life in its laughter and its grief but always emerging from it a life of the spirit prevails, the spirit that contemplates and is filled with compassion." In short, "a profound conception of the unity of all life pervades it" Truly "Ajanta is a complete expression of every side of the Indian soul" What we witness with wonder, as we pass from cave to cave, from sculpture to sculpture, and painting to painting is the free play given to the spirit in man. It is not the mythology of Buddhism but the value of the spirit that inspired it, that makes Ajanta an unforgettable contribution, that the Deccan has made to the cultural history of the world

Where Pulakesi - Harsa Battle Took Place?

BY

SHAM RA SHENDE,
BRIHAN-MAHARASHITRIYA KARYALAYA, SANGLI (BOMBAY)

PULAKESI was one of the mightiest and glorious emperors the Deccan has ever produced. He ruled not only the whole of India below Vindhya but also over late¹ (southern Gujarat)² Gurjaratra¹ (northern Gujarat² and central and southern Rajaputana) and Malava countries north of Vindhya mountains. His contemporary was Harsa ruling at Kanoja another equally illustrious King. The result was they had to test their might and valour one day which they did and Harsa had to sustain defeat³. This achievement gave Pulakesi a world wide fame. Presents came from the King of Persia. The title Parameswar was assumed by him and in later inscriptions he has been described as " श्रीहरीषवर्धन पराजयोपात्त परमेश्वरचंद्रस्य सत्याश्रय .महाराजाधिराज. " ३ (६). This battle between these two rivals is thus an established fact, two points relating to which are yet unsolved. These are (1) when this battle took place and (2) where it was fought. The first has been discussed by Dr. Altekar of Benares Hindu University and the present attempt is to deal with the second.

Determining the place of the battle has a historical significance. All leading historians such as Sri Bhandarkar, Fleet, V Smith have fixed Narmada as the northern boundry of Pulakesi's empire, even though they have admitted that he had conquered Lata, Malava and Gurjar countries and these were within his empire. These three countries lying north of Narmada river, northern border of Pulakesi's empire must be beyond these countries and not Narmada river. The present attempt is aimed at removing this misunderstanding.

Name of the writer	Name of the Book	When written	Year of the battle	Place of the battle
1	Ravikirti Aihole inscription	634 A D
2.	Yuan Chwang. Beal's Buddhist Record of Western India Vol. II, p. 255	639 A D
3	Dr. Fleet Bom Gaz Vol IX P I, page pp 350-53	1896 A D	609-10 A D	Narmada
4.	Dr R G Bhandarkar Ibid p 183	1896 A D		Narmada.

As regards the first issue the contemporary writers Ravikirti and Yuvan Chwang are silent Dr. Fleet who edited the Aihole inscription twice in 1876⁴ and 1879⁵ gave the date as 609-10 and Dr. V Smith as 620⁶, Mr. Diskalkar as 630⁷ but Dr. Altekar has very ably gone through all the pros and cons of the documentary and epigraphical evidences and arrived at the conclusion that "Harsa must have planned his offensive against Pulakesi between 630 - 634 A D",⁸ We should therefore accept 630 - 634 A D as the date of this battle

The second issue is still undecided

The Aihole inscription which has been accepted by all as an authentic document, has been relied upon as a source to write an account of Pulakesi and his ancestors, This inscription describe this incidence of the defeat of Harsa as —

The purport of this is.—Harsa prosperous with wealth offered to him by his feudatories was made to lose his joy on account of the fear caused by the death of many of his elephants in the battle with Pulakesi.

Here the poet describes the defeat of Harsa and the killing of his elephants by Pulakesi but he is silent as to the place where it was fought, and also about the cause of it, but the previous verse (22) tells us that Pulakesi's suzerainty has been accepted by the Kings of Lata, Malava and Gurjar countries. Thus Pulakesi seems to have reached the doors of Harsa, as a result of which he has made preparations for an attack upon this invader. Yuan Chwang narrates it thus—“At the present time Siladitya Maharaja has gathered troops from five Indies and summoned the best leaders from all countries and himself gone at the head of his armies to punish and subdue these people but he has not conquered their troops” on the contrary he was defeated. Yuan Chwang did not point out the place of this battle and therefore the scholars of this day have been required to find it out.

This inscription has been edited for the third time by Dr. Kielhorn¹¹ in 1900-01, but he also left this point unanswered. In 1884 Sir Dr. Bhandarkar made two definite statements¹²—(1) Harsa endeavoured to extend his empire south of Narmada and (2) Pulakesi kept strong armies to guard his boundary on the bank of Narmada without putting forth any evidence to support these. Dr. Fleet, in 1896, made similar statement but in different words, while giving the account of the defeat of Harsa, as “An attack¹³ by Harsa did not succeed in penetrating to the south of Reva where Pulakesi's armies were encamped.” He asserts this by saying “text implies” The ‘text’ wherein the battle has been described, has been given above, but there is no mention of the place of the battle nor reference to the encampment of the armies of Pulakesi, not to the intention of Harsa to undertake this campaign.

Leaving aside the point of the “text” aside for a while let us examine how far these statements are well founded. Yuan Chwang gives the reason as “to¹⁴ punish and subdue” Pulakesi who has reached the borders of his kingdom and not that “he desired to extend his empire south of Narmada.”

Now let us see which was the target of Harsa's attack either “the forces of Pulakesi on Narmada where they were encamped” or

"to attack and subdue" the armies of Pulakesi arrived on western borders of his kingdom. In 629 A.D.,¹⁵ Pulakesi's suzerainty had been accepted the King of Gurjaratra i.e., Rajaputana and he was attacked by Harsa sometime in 1630. Yuan Chwang made this statement in 639¹⁶ from Badami. The Chinese traveller's account is accepted as authentic and we will safely take his words as the correct account of what had then occurred. Pulakesi's successful series of conquests for over 20 years must have reached the ears of Harsa, who, when found this great adventurer reached his door, would, as wise a ruler and a tactful warrior, have, preferred, first, to "attack, punish and subdue" him, rather than to go a long way off the Narmada river to extend his empire. The battle therefore must have been fought on the borders of Gurjaratra and that of the Kingdom of Harsa and not on the banks of Narmada.

Let us now see what "the text" says on this point. Verse 23, which describes the battle does not point out the battle-field nor its cause. Which then is the text referred to by the Doctor? It is certainly not V. 23. The learned Doctor, it seems took recourse to V. 24 as supplementing the previous one as a part of the description of the battle. It runs as —

भुवमुक्षमिरनीकै शसतो यस्यरेवा
 विविधपुलिन शोक्षावन्थ्य विन्ध्योपकण्ठः ॥
 अधिकतरमराजत् स्वेनतेजो महिम्ना
 शिरवरिभिरिभर्जो वर्षणासर्धयेव ॥ २४

The substance of this is — While Pulakesi was ruling the earth with his armies, the Vindhya rich in beauty of the sandy banks of Reva, shone by its own lustre more due to peaks, being devoid of elephants, which were greater in bulk than those (peaks) and therefore envied (by the peaks).

Here there is mention of Reva and Vindhya but those are neither said to be the battle field nor a military camp of Pulakesi.

Line of thinking preferred by Dr Fleet, seems to be that इभवर्ज (V. 24) i.e., absence of elephants is the result of युधिपतित गजेन्द्र (V. 23) (having been killed in the battle) and since the absence is said to be in the vicinity of Vindhya (V. 24), and the battle must therefore have taken place in the vicinity of that mountain by the side of which the river Reva or Narmada flows. He did not take notice of the verse 22 and the historical incidents relating to it. Let us see whether इभवर्ज i.e. absence of elephants was the result of युधिपतित गजेन्द्र i.e. killing of the elephants in the battle is tenable.

15 Annals of B. O. R. I. Vol. XIII, P. 305

16 Bom. Gaz. Vol. I, Part II, Page 352 last line.

(1) Dr Fleet translated इमवर्ज as "though Vindhya was deserted by its elephants" implying thereby that Vindhya was devoid of these, on account of the region of Vindhya and Reva west of Bhopal and Hande is climatically unsuitable for the elephants to live in.

(2) Absence of elephants as told by the poet was due to rivalry वर्ष्मणा स्वर्धेयव as to their bulk between peaks and the elephants

(3) Dr Kilhorn ascribes it to the legend of Agastya who ordered the mountain not to grow but it will have to do so if the bulk of the elephants would be larger than that of the peaks

(4) Armies of Harsa usually contained thousands of elephants and it seems impossible that all those would have been killed and not one is left alive to make the mountain इमवर्ज

(5) Taken 1 to 4 clauses together into consideration the cause of the absence of elephants in Vindhya can only be clause (1) and not the poetic allusions of the clause (2) or (3) We cannot therefore accept clause (4) which is an impossibility

(6) Verse 24 is devoted to a fresh point १८ भुवमुर भिरनीकै शसतो यस्य (पुलकेशिनः) (after the battle is won,) "he has made arrangements for governing the countries conquered so far on the strength of his armies," Pulakesi (while returning home) reached Vindhya and Reva, the splendour and might of which the poet thought of comparing with that of his hero. By defeating Harsa Pulakesi attained world wide fame, and the poet therefore allowed two Verses (24 & 25) for eulogizing the emperor and to do that Ravi-kirti compared his hero with Vindhya for grandeur and loftiness in V 24 and with Indra for powers, qualities and nobility in V 25

विधिवदुपचितामि शक्तिमि शक्रकल्प
तिस्रमिरपिगुणैवै. स्वैश्च साहाकुल्यै ॥

(7) The eulogies lastly ended in अगमदधिपतित्व यो महाराष्ट्रकाणाम्

नवनवति सहस्रग्रामभाजाम् त्रयाणाम् ॥ २५ that the Victorious king became lord paramount of Maharastra consisting of 99000 villages

Taking all these points together into consideration we cannot but arrive at —

(a) that the battle field cannot be Reva river but most probably the eastern boundary of Gujjaratia which was close to Harsa's empire ,

(b) that the absence of elephants in Vindhya can be ascribed to the climatic unsuitability for the elephants to live in ,

(c) that the absenty elephants did not belong to Harsa since army of Harsa did not go to Vindhya ,

(d) that the verse 24 does not relate to the later portion of Harsa Pulakesi battle, but is an eulogy in which Pulakesi is said to have set up the management of the conquered countries and described as being grand and lofty as Vindhya mountain

COLONIZATION OF BHARATA-KHANDA BY THE VAIDIKA ARYAS

BY

SHAN RA SHENDE,

Brihan Maharashtra Karyalaya, Sangli (Bombay)

HISTORY of the Bharata-Khanda¹ begins with the advent of the Vaidika Aryas after they had colonized it and it will be interesting to know how they had spread all over the country. This attempt aims at dealing with the geographical aspect of it.

It has been an admitted fact that the Vaidika Aryas entered Bharata-Khanda by the north-western passes and begun settling by the banks of the river Sindhu. They must have continued this process till they reached the Arabian sea, which has been made clear from the name 'Sind' that part received. While going by this Sindhu river some miles west of Multan another river meets it. It seems some of the colonizers must have taken their course by this new river which is the confluence of several tributaries of the Punjab rivers. That the Vaidika Aryas had practically occupied whole of the Punjab by settling on the banks of all these tributaries, can be seen from the mentions of all these —

.. सरस्वति शुतुद्रि स्तोम सचथा पुरुष्या ।

आसिकन्या मरुद्वे वितस्तयार्जकीये शुणुह्वा सुषोमया ॥

The Rigveda refers to a general term 'Sapta-Sindhavah'² most probably to the confluence referred to above. The Rigveda mentions 'Sapta-Sindhavah' country³ possibly to this colony on the Sindhu and Sapta-Sindhu rivers. This is the first colony the Vaidika Aryas made in Bharata-Khanda.

1 (a) Bharata Khanda or Varsa is the name found used to this continent in Vayu Purana I 45 75 76

वर्षे यद् भारत नाम यत्रैव भारतीप्रजा ॥

भरणाच्चे प्रजानां वै मनुभरितर उच्यते ॥

निरुक्त वचनाच्चैव वर्षे तद् भारत स्मृतम् ॥

(b) Bharata is the name of a people of great importance since Rigveda times Rig III, 53 12 & 24, VI 16 4 & 19, VII 8 4

It is but natural that in the primitive stages of the colonization when the population was very limited and untilled and fertile lands were abundant, the colonizers must have preferred such regions to settle and cultivate which were easy for tilling and rich in yielding crops. Such lands can only be the banks of the rivers. These lands are formed by the layers of mud brought thereby yearly floods and we see the grateful Vaidika Aiyas praised⁴ these rivers at length

Since these Vaidika Aiyas entered Bharata-Khanda, they found it convenient to adopt the method of river side-colonization, the country being full of rivers.

Before proceeding further, it is necessary to make clear what we mean by the term 'colony'. When a portion of a group of people moving aside from the main body leads an independent march to a fresh land and settles there to form altogether a new society to suit politically, socially and culturally the needs and circumstances arising on account of the climate and new neighbours. Consequently this new society gets a new name and an adjectival form of it as a name for the region it colonizes and also one for the new dialect they adopt there. Whole of this process of colonization is termed here a 'Colony'. The Motto behind this colonization being कृण्वन्ती विश्वमार्यम् ¹⁵ i.e., to convert the universe to Aryism, result of which was the complete Aryanization of the entire length and breadth of this continent and the name Bharata-Khanda it received, makes it still more clear.

After these adventures had spread all over the regions of the Punjab rivers and reached its south easterly borders, they must have come across Yamuna⁶ and Ganga⁷ rivers and began settling by the banks of these and their tributaries, that is Gomati⁸ and Sarayu⁹ which are mentioned in the Rigveda. The second colony commenced when these people reached Yamuna and Ganga and continued till they reached Varanasi (Benares) the third between Gomati and Sarayu, thus reaching the eastern part of Bharata-Khanda. That all these rivers have been recorded in the Rigveda, shows that these colonies came into being when the Rigveda was being composed. The Rigveda does not mention the regional names of the two later colonies, which we will find when we will peep into the history of their spoken languages. These three colonies mark the march of the Vaidika Aryas right from the north-western boundary of the country to that of the eastern. Reason of this easy progress was abundance of rivers suppling water and mud twice a year enriching the soils lying on both their banks, to yelid crops in greater quantity and quality with less efforts

Now to come to the story of how the fourth colony came into being. The adventurers of the second colony while moving further by the banks of Yamuna, met Carmanvatī¹⁰ merging into it some miles east of Agra. It is but natural that some of the colonizers must have preferred going by the banks of this new river. This new river springing up in the Vindhya Mountains in Dhar state has travelled in the north, easterly direction through C I, Rajaputana and U. P. and meets Yamuna. Its path while in Malwa is normally soily but as it enters Rajaputana which is full of rocky and barren lands, till it reaches U. P. districts. Unfortunately for the colonizers, their course was not so comfortable as that of the Punjab and U. P. The result was that instead of making a settlement there they had to proceed further on their march till they met another river Kṣīra,¹¹ the banks of which were fertile and climate was normal to settle down. This is Avanti Desha where they commenced creating their fourth colony. After the colonization of Avanti might have been complete, it seems, that two of its branches preferred two different directions to reach freash regions. One went to the south below Vindhya and the other crossed Aravali and marched to the west. The first Branch has succeeded in crossing Narmada river and Vindhya mountain¹² and colonized Asmaka and Vidarbha and created a colony in Dakṣinapatha. This new colony to the south of Vindhya extended upto Godavari¹³. It seems, from the references given below that the colonization of the Vaidika Aryas that reached upto Godavari was in its process, when Vaidika Literature was being composed. These references are rather indirect. They are —The Carmasiras,¹⁴ an Acharya of etymology, may have some connection with the name Carmanvatī river, references to which we find in the second century¹⁵ of the Shakaera. The river Kṣīra and Dakṣinapada¹⁶ seem to have been referred in the Rīgveda, Vidarbha and Reva river have been referred to as Revottaras¹⁷ and in Vaidarbhiya Bhīmaya¹⁸ and Vaidarbhi Kondanya¹⁹ in the Satapatha and Aitareya Brahmanas, and the formation of the word Godavari seems to have been based on the Vaidika usages, such as Satavani and Vibhavari etc. The name Narmada will be found referred to in Khila Sukta²⁰ of Rigveda. The regional names such as Avanti, Kosla, Kalnga, Asmaka,²¹ Vindhya, Riksha, Dakshinapatha²² are found referred to in Mahabharata, Ramayana and Astadhyayi.

The second branch of the colonizers of Avanti Desha have taken recourse to the passes of Aravali mountains via Dohad²⁴ to reach Anarta Desha and settle on the banks of the rivers Mahi, Sabaramati and latter on continued colonizing the Sapta-Kokana²⁵ i.e. Aparanta Desha, the long strip of land between the sea and Sahyadri ranges through the beds of Narmada, Tapi, Damanganga and several streams flowing between them. The colonization stretched up to Gokarna and Mangalore and further south. This seems to be the post Vaidika colonization and therefore not found referred to in Vaidika Literature.

An offshoot of Sind colonizers have, it seems, come down to Kachha and Saurashtra,²⁶ and met and mixed with those who have gaone there from Anarta. Similarly some, seem to have gaon there by sea from Sind.²⁷

Now coming back to Vaidha colony we find that some have gaon from there to Kosala and Kalinga²⁸ and further on to Andhra or Triling Desha.

Those who have reached Godavari have on its banks colonized Nasikya, Petanika and Muluka²² and further south between Krishna and Tungabhadra Karnataka and Kuntala.

Upto Tungabhadra we find Aryan Domination from cultural, social and racial points of view as well as from the point of the modes of living.

Kosal is connected with Kaling (see Ithole Inscription). Offshoots of Marathi are still available in Orissa and Bastar States.

Thus we have seen that the Vaidika Aryas have colonized and dominated and became absolute masters of the N W F.P., the Punjab, the U P, Bihar, Sind, Rajaputana, C I, Bombay Presidency including Kachha, Kathiwar, C P, Orisa, Nizami 'State', Portuguese territories on the west coast and Mangalore district of the Madras Presidency and Indian States in between the above mention Provinces

Before the Vaidika Aryas reached and domiciled this continent, it must have been inhabited by one or more races, which, it seems, have been completely absorbed through marriages and confersion into their fold by these powerful and culturally advanced new comers. No trace of these has been left behind except some modes of living or religious practices accepted and assimilated by the Vaidika Aryas. Another thing we have to see that the adventurers left unvisited the hilly or mountainous tracts or left the residents of those places undisturbed or the residents of those places who sustained defeat at the hands of the Aryas and refused to be subdued and absorbed, must have fled to the jungles and hills for safety. To-day they are termed as hilly or jungle tribes or aborigines.

A word for Mahisaka or Mahisa Mandala²⁹ colony i.e. Mysore state. The Vaidika Aryas did dominate this part and were its masters at least upto the beginning of the Shaka era. They might not have been there in great majority but they were masters there. We can judge it from the prevalence of Sanskrit and Prakrit languages till the period mentioned above.

The local Kannad language of this state got an upper hand over the languages of Vaidika Aryas after the Jains, who reached there by the 3rd century³⁰ before the Shaka era, made it a vehicle for preaching their religion³¹. Even then Sanskrit has still been their religious and cultural language.

History of the spoken languages of Bharata Khanda in its early days will throw more light on this subject and therefore is being given below -

History of the Spoken languages

The cultural and literary languages of the Vaidika Aryas were Chanda³² in the Vaidika days and the Sanskrit in the Upnissadak and later days. These being academic remained unchanged while they had spoken dialects which were used for practical purposes. These were therefore subject to undergo changes from time to time and from place to place and caste to caste. These dialects were corrupt forms of the Chanda or Sanskrit languages. These corrupt forms of speech are found termed as Mleccha³³ in Satapatha Brahmana which is dated as 3100 years³⁴ before the Shaka era. Apabhāṣa, and Apasabda³⁵ in Patanjala Mahabhasya as Alpiyamsah Sabdah and Apabhramsah³⁶ in Sayana Chaiya Kṛita Rīgveda Bhasyopakramanika and got the name Prakṛita in Panīniya Siksā and also ranked as holy as Sanskrita as —

प्राकृते सङ्कृते चापीस्वय प्रोक्ता स्वयमुवा ॥

These Prakṛit forms of speeches are deeply associated to a great extent with the process of shaping the history of the above named colonies, so much so that through the sources of these we are able to determine their extent and their names. The Prakṛit forms of speeches came into existence in the regions where these were used in daily life. That these Prakṛits reached literary stages, can be presumed from their grammars required to be written to avoid incorrect uses. The first of them is written by Vararuchi of the 6th century³⁷ before the Shaka era and describes four Prakṛits, namely Paisaci, Samāsani, Magadhi and Maharashti. It is clear from their names that these are adjectival forms of the names of the regions where these have been brought into being, by the people residing there. Thus Paisaci³⁸ was the language spoken in Pisacha Desha by the Pisachha people. Similarly there were Surasena and Magadha and Maharashtra Countries where the other three Prakṛits were spoken by the people of these regions.

Although Sanskrit could not maintain its position as a spoken language of the masses, it remained alive but unchanged as a religious and classical language and will continue to be so forever.

Prakrits are living languages and have undergone changes from time to time and have shaped into regional and caste dialects. This we find in the dramas and grammars.

This is the reason why the Prakrits and not Sanskrit have provided us sources, to distinguish colony of the Vaidika Arya from another.

Thus we have seen that the Vaidika Aryas had colonized and Aryanized in majority the Provinces mentioned above. Now we will see what happened in the remaining parts i.e. Bengal, Assam and Madras Presidency where the Vaidika Aryas did go but in minority, resulting in racial and cultural admixture of the new comers with those of the former residents.

The colonizers in these three provinces have adopted Vaidika religion and Sanskrit as their religious and cultural language.

But as to the spoken languages the results are different. In Bengal and Assam the colonizers were strong enough to maintain their Prakrit dialects and therefore we find Bengali and Assamese are of springs of Maghadhi.

The tale of the colonizers of the Madras Presidency is abnormal. They have there four different colonies with four different branches of Dravidian languages i.e. Telugu, Kanarese, Malayalam and Tamil.

The speakers of Telugu went to Trilinga or Andhra viz Odia or Kalinga where the Vaidika Aryas have gone through Vidarbha and Kosala³⁸. The speakers of the Kanarese went to Karnataka viz, Kuntala and Mahisa-Mendale Desha.³⁹

The speakers of Malayalam went to Malayala Desha or Malbar through Aparanta⁴⁰ or Sapta-Kokana,

And those of the colonizers who were on the fore fronts of those three colonies namely Trilinga, Karnataka and Malbar might have joined together to create a new society in Tamil Nad and the present day residents of this Nad are seen speaking Tamil Language.

This is the story of the colonization and Aryanization of Bharat-Khanda by Vaidika Aryas.

39 The present Kanarese speaking Districts of the Bombay Presidency and Nizam's Dominion are ethnically, culturally, socially and from the point of Modes of Living and methods of Preparing food, and dress as well as in matrimonial relations are one with Maharashtra, and none with those of proper Karnataka i.e. Mysore state and south easterly regions. The language they speak is not their own.

40 It is found that Saurashtra Society of Madura went there about Pandya regime from Saurashtra through Aparanta taking with them the language of this region namely Marathi and Kokani. This shows the route of colonization along the western coast to the southern most point of Bharata Khanda.

Life and Mission of Sri Basaveswara from Telugu Sources

BY

K LAKSHMI RANJANAM,

LECTURER IN TELUGU OSMANIA UNIVERSITY, HYDERABAD

ALTHOUGH Sri Basaveswara, the founder of Vira Saivism lived and worked in the Kanarese country the earliest references to his life and mission are contained in Telugu Literature. This need cause no surprise considering that the Andhra Karnataka people were almost like one family for many centuries. They had many striking affinities, cultural, literary and social. The Telugu and Kanarese languages are nearer to each other than any other Dravidian group of speeches. Even to this day their scripts appear to be similar. There was full and free literary intercourse. Poets of either language freely borrowed and imitated the literary models of the other. Sometimes the Telugu-Kanarese people lived under a common Government as under the Vizianagar empire. Naturally the social and religious movements of either people had their echoes at once in the sister nation.

About the time when Sri Basaveswara started his religious and social revolution the Telugu Kanarese people had closely allied Governments. The Telugu country was under the rule of the Kakatiyas who were fast becoming a formidable power in the Dekkan. The Kanarese country now came under the rule of Bijjala of the Kalachuri dynasty. Prola II the Kakatiya King of Anamakonda and Bijjala of Kalyan were partners in the movement for over-throwing the power of the Western Chalukyas. The Kakatiyas were in the beginning the Mahamandalaswaras under the Western Chalukyas and aspired to become independent. Bijjala was the war minister and commander under Tailapa II. The Kakatiya king defeated and took prisoner his Western Chalukyan master. Bijjala conceived the scheme of usurping the throne of the Chalukyas. He was assisted in his design by Prola II of Anamakonda and by Vijayanka, the feudatory ruler of Kolhapur. By 1157 A.D. the confederates put an end to the rule of Tailapa at Kalyan and Bijjala seized power. Soon after Prola II seems to have died and was succeeded by Rudradeva. The friendly relations that characterised the Kakatiyas and the Kalachuris continued under Rudra also. Thus the field was favourable for an exchange of religious and social movements Sri Basaveswara started his reform movement from the Kingdom of Bijjala. Soon it spread to the Telugu country also and found ready reception there. King Rudra himself was a follower of Saivism. Though the Andhra country did not go the whole length with Sri Basava's Vira Saiva movement yet it was deeply stirred by it. Thus the political alliance of the rulers of Telugu and Kanarese countries encouraged the spread of the on-rushing social revolution.

Saivism was not new to the Telugu country though the Vira Saiva method was. The worship of Rudra-siva was as old as the Rigveda. Just as the benevolent aspects of nature were attributed to Vishnu the fearful and terrible elements in nature were traced to Rudra who was at the same time credited with many beneficent and healing powers also. These brought him the title of Siva, the auspicious. The Dravidian races were worshippers of Lord Siva at a very early time and scholars are of opinion that they contributed much to the development of the idea of God Rudra-Siva. What the religious ideas of the Telugu Country were before the Budhistic period it is not exactly possible to say. There was some form of Siva cult in the worship of the goddess Kali and the Nagas or serpents which were the accessories of Siva. During the early centuries of the Christian era Budhism and Jainism had full hold on the Andhra country. Some of the Andhra Emperors and the Ikshvakus were Budhists in religion. With the return of the country to the path of Vedic religion the worship of Siva became more and more prominent. Attavarman, the Ananda Gotra King of Kanderapura called himself a worshipper of Sambha in his Gorantla plates. The Vishnukundin monarchs in 5th Century A. D. styled themselves as worshippers of the holy feet of the Lord of Sri Parvata. This was a reference to God Mallikarjuna Siva of Sri Sailam in the Kurnool District. The very name of the Telugu country 'Trilinga Desa' indicates the great partiality which Andhras had for the worship of Siva. 'Trilinga' means the land of three famous Siva Lingas. These are Draksharama in the present East Godavary District, Kaleswaram in H. E. H. the Nizam's Dominions and Sri Sailam in the Kurnool District. They were the oldest centres of Siva worship in Andhra Desa. The Kotappa Konda in Narsaraopet Taluq. Guntur was another ancient Saiva place of pilgrimage. Sri Kalahasti in the Nellore District situated on the banks of the river Svarnamukhi grew to be another famous Saiva centre. Thus when Budhism and Jainism were replaced at a very early period by the worship of Siva in the Andhra country. The Eastern Chalukyas were worshippers of Lord Siva. King Rajanarendra (1022-63 A. D.) under whose patronage Telugu literature first made its emergence, took pride in being a devotee of Siva.

But the Saivism which so far prevailed was of the mild variety. It did not develop or evince any intolerance of the idea of Vishnu or other Gods. But gradually this aspect of Saivism became prominent in the Telugu country under three famous Saiva teachers who were called 'Pandita Trayamu' the three great pandits. These were Sripati Pandita, Manchena Pandita and Mallikarjuna Pandita. They were given the title of Ārādhyas i.e. the worshipful teachers. They proclaimed that Lord Siva was the only God to the exclusion of all other Gods including Vishnu. He was accessible to Bhakti, devotional worship only. All devotees of Siva, of whatever caste they might be enjoyed equal social status. Inequalities of caste and birth should not be considered in the fold of the worshippers of Siva. Whoever did not follow the religion of Siva was a Bhavi, and deserved condemnation. No quarter should be asked from him or given to him. Of the three great Saiva Pandits, Sripati Pandita was the earliest. He lived at Bezvada and was the preceptor of Anantapala (1095-1118 A.D.) who was a commander of the Vikarmaditya VI of the Western Chalukya dynasty. It was said of Sripati Pandita that he bore live coals in his cloth in order to prove that there was no God except Lord Siva. The last of these Saiva teachers was Mallikarjuna Panditaradhya who was a contemporary of Sri Basaveswara. He was the author of 'Siva-tattva-sara' a work in Telugu which expounds the principles of the new, exclusive type of Saivism that was coming into vogue in the 12th century A.D.

It was the poet Palkuriki Somanatha who first celebrated the life of Sri Basaveswara in his work 'Basava Puana'. Somanatha wrote his poem in Telugu. He said of himself that he was the pupil of the grandson of one Saiva teacher, Belidevi Vemana Ārādhyas who was a friend and close associate of Mallikarjuna Pandita. The Pandit being a contemporary of Basava must have lived about 1160 A.D. Palkuriki Soma wrote another great work 'Panditaradhya charitra' being the life of Mallikarjuna Pandita. Herein he narrated how this Pandit who lived in the Godavary District started on a journey to visit Sri Basaveswara at Kalyan. While he was still on the way news reached him that the founder of Vira Saivism passed away from mortal life. This event is placed at about 1167 A.D. The Pandit also died soon after this. Belidevi Vemana Ārādhyas was a friend of Mallikarjuna Pandita. The pupil of this grandson might be removed from him by not more than forty or fifty years. This poet Palkuriki Soma might be said to have lived about the beginning of the 13th century. The date assigned to him in the History of the lives of Kannada poets is A.D. 1190. Palkuriki Soma was held in great esteem by Kanarese poets because he was the first to write on the life and mission of Sri Basava. A few scholars have tried of late to bring down Palkuriki Somanatha to the beginning of the 14th century A D on the basis of some popular stories recorded in Telugu Literature. But this attempt is untenable in the light of the evidence furnished by the poet himself that he was the pupil of the grandson of Belidevi Vemana. He could not have been removed from Mallikarjuna Pandita by such a long period as a century and a half. It is interesting to note that Palkuriki Somanatha belonged to the Telanga Districts of H E H the Nizam's Dominions. He is said to have lived in the village of Palkuriki in the Warangal district.

Palkuriki was a great champion of the Vira Saiva faith and did his utmost to popularise that religion through his numerous writings. He was a great poet who wrote with puritanic fervour verses of a torrential nature. At the same time he was a great scholar and was deeply versed in the Vedas and Puranas. He was a Brahman at first though afterwards he seems to have renounced Brahmanism as it was inconsistent with his Vira Saiva Faith. Not content with describing the life of Sri Basava in his purana, Palkuriki Soma celebrated him in another work of his, the 'Vrishadhupa Sataka'. Besides he wrote some works in Sanskrit expounding the tenets of Vira Saivism.

As to his sources of information about the life of Basava, the poet said that he drew inspiration from popular songs of the devotees of Basava. Once on the sacred Sri Saila mountain, there gathered several important Vira Saiva teachers. In that assembly were men like Karasthali Somanathayya who received the favour of Mallikarjuna Pandita. Palkuriki Soma addressed himself to this assembly and requested them permission to compose Basava Purana. From them he learnt the incidents of the life of Basaveswara. Thus Somanatha had access to sources of information which were nearly contemporary. Still it being an age when men freely believed in miracles and supernatural powers the life of Basava as narrated by Somanatha is full of miraculous incidents. We have to carefully sift the evidence placed before us and we do get much information which is of historical value.

Somanatha introduced into his main narrative stories of numerous Saiva devotees old and new. For some of them he seems to have relied upon the Tamil Periyapurana which describes the lives of Tamil Saivite Saints. Saivism had made great strides in the Tamil country from 7th century A D onwards under the lead of poet Saints like Tirujnana Sambandur.

According to Basava purana once the great Rishi Narada went to the audience of Lord Siva and informed him that several religions ruled the earth but that people neglected the worship of Siva. The sage requested the Lord to send his messenger on the earth so that he might inspire the people in Saivism. The Lord at once deputed his chief follower Nandikeswara to be born upon the earth and revive the religion of Siva. Accordingly Nandikeswara was born as a son to the pious Brahmin couple Mandega Madiraja and his wife Madamba. They lived in the village of Hinguleswara Bhagavati in the Kannada country west of Sri Sailam. The child was named Basava which means the sacred Bull, the vehicle of Lord Siva. From very early childhood Basava gave indications of devotion to Siva. At the age of eight his father wanted to perform the Upanayana ceremony to Basava which alone would entitle a Brahmin to begin the study of the Vedas. Precocious lad that he was Basava refused to undergo the ceremony and argued with his father thus "How do you talk of this ceremony. How did you become so ignorant being a worshipper of Lord Siva. Having accepted the Lord himself as Guru is it not a sin to choose earthly precepts. Having learnt the Saiva Mantra which destroys all sins is it not unwise to repeat other formulas. How can we bow to wicked men who are like untouchables with the same hands that are dedicated to the obeisance of Siva. Do your wish to bind with ties of Brahmanism one who has broken all bonds of caste. How can one be a Brahmin and a Bhakta at the same time. The Brahmin worships several deities. If he be a devotee of Siva he can never do this. The Brahmin follows the path of Karma and we break the bonds of Karma". The argument went on spiritedly like this and child Basava renounced parents and his home and went away into the wide world proclaiming his revolutionary views.

He was accompanied by his sister Nagamba. When Basava left home his uncle Baladeva Dandanayaka who came to witness the initiation ceremony, was taken aback with surprise at the fortitude of the boy. He at once decided to give his daughter Gangamba in marriage to Basava. Baladeva Dandanayaka had previously taken a vow not to give his daughter to any one who was not a staunch Saiva. He was the Minister to King Bijjala of Kalyan. The marriage of Sri Basava with Gangamba was celebrated with great fervour and all Saivas rejoiced immensely at the incident. Then the young couple and Basava's sister Nagamba proceeded to pay homage to Lord Sanganaswara of Kudali. Kudali was the confluence of the rivers Tungabhadra and Krishna. Dr. R.G. Bhandarkar considers that this Kudali was the joining place of Krishna and Malaprabha. Lord Siva of this place was the patron God of Sri Basava. The Lord made his appearance to Basaveswara and exhorted him with a divine message "Oh Basava, never desert the path of devotion. The faults of the devotees of Siva you must consider as virtues only and not as evil deeds. If one bears a Linga on his body treat him as a friend even if he were an enemy. Never break the oaths and disciplines you have undertaken. The true path is not to enquire into the caste of Bhaktas. Those wicked men who denounce Siva must be killed by you as veritable death. If Bhaktas offend you, curse you or even beat you take it as a favour. If you cast evil glances on the women folk of others Oh Basava, I will be really cross with you. You must reject every kind of food which is not the offering to devotees. Praise the Jangamas heartily and treat them as my incarnations. Think of us when you are in mortal difficulty. At all times, Oh Basava, do not transgress the path of truth."

. Having received the divine command Basava was spending time in the temple of the Lord when duty called him to the court of Kalyan. Bijjala's Minister Baladeva died and the king looked out for his successor. His advisers suggested the name of his nephew and son-in-law Basava. The king readily agreed and sent messengers to fetch his young minister from Kudali. He received him with great cordiality and made him his prime minister. Sri Basava is often called Dandanayaka by Palkuriki Soma. Possibly he was also the commander of the King. Not only that Basava seems to be the high treasurer of Bijjala for one of his favourite titles was 'Bandari Basava', i.e. Basava the treasurer. In those days the position of the prime Minister carried with it the command of the royal forces and presiding over the treasury. In his very first audience with the King, Basaveswara did not mince words and said to him 'It is not too much for great Lord Siva to take care of your Kingdom. But oh king you must always show deference to the devotees of Siva and be humble to them'. That was the crux of the problem. Basava could speak gently and sternly as ministership was not of his seeking. This demand was going to put a severe strain upon the relations of King and minister in future. Basaveswara made the palace of his uncle Baladeva Dandanayaka the seat of his high office. He soon made a name as a great and successful minister and the prosperity of Bijjala grew under his wise care.

Little is known about the domestic life of Basaveswara. Indeed it must have been one of utter simplicity and devotion to Lord Siva. He wanted nothing for himself. He was lavish in giving to the Bhaktas. He gave away everything which he possessed for the cause of the Jangamas i.e. Saiva devotees. Basava lived very little for himself and mostly for the brotherhood of Saivas. His mission to spread the cult of Vira Saivism was the be all and end all of his life. Basaveswara had an impressive personality. Young in age, charming in personality, resolute in purpose, deep in humility and self-negation, he naturally won the sympathies of the masses of people. He mixed freely with them. He preached and practised the doing away with all caste-barriers.

That made him immensely popular with the low and the down-trodden. The working class people, the artisans, the Vaisyas all flocked to his banner eagerly and embraced Vira Saivism. The outward symbols of this were the wearing of the sacred Linga on the body, be-smearing the body with holy ashes i.e. 'Vibhuti', wearing garlands of beads, last but not least the carrying of a sword. For the Saivism which Basaveswara propagated was of the militant type. It brooked no opposition. Where learned argument failed the sharp edge of the sword was used to enforce conviction in the case of wilful traducers. Sri Basaveswara himself carried on his body the sacred sword which was called 'Lingapasayita' (sanskrit Linga-prasadita) i.e. given by the Linga Vira Saivism inspired the devotees to appalling acts of self-mortification or sometimes to acts of mere bravado. A devotee must be ready to give and take life without hesitation. Basaveswara's living was the very embodiment of the courageous but gentle Vira Siva devotee. His very presence inspired reverence, humility and devotion to Lord Siva in the lowest of people. Many are the stories narrated about Sri Basava converting men to his faith by his mere appearance.

Basava's sister Nagamba stood by him through thick and thin. She had a son by name Chenna Basava. He afterwards became the right hand man of Basveswara in spreading the Vira Saiva faith. In fact he was considered even superior to his uncle in theological matters. The birth of Chenna Basava was unnecessarily shrouded in mystery. The Saivas must have helped to do this in order to make Chenna Basava an extraordinary and God sent hero. The Jainas who were the opponents of the Vira Saivas twisted these wild stories to suit their own needs in blackening the character of Basava's sister. They wrote that Nagambika bore the son by promiscuous relations. It is unthinkable that a high souled woman like Nagambika would stoop so low as alleged by jains. Unfortunately in Indian history the fond method of attributing extraordinary relations to great men by unthinking devotees has done more harm than good to their characters and the causes for which they lived and died. The Basava Purana is wisely silent about the birth of Chenna Basava.

The public activities of Sri Basveswara though utterly sincere were calculated to strain his relations with his king. The Basava Purana mentions some of his vows which must have influenced his policies. "The vow to celebrate each day as a Sivaratri, the vow not to look into the faults of Bhaktas nor to speak sternly to them, the vow not to refuse any money that was asked of him, the vow not to deceive in the least, the vow to speak out what he thought fearlessly and to act up to what he spoke, the vow not to belie his own plighted word, the vow not to look with evil eyes at the women of others, the vow not to desire the wealth of other men, the vow to destroy other cults and to root out those who denied Vira Saiva Faith, the vow not to salute a Bhavi z.e., one who is not a Vira Saiva devotee, the vow not to have any give and take with him, the vow not to yield to bodily passions" Basaveswara lived upto this stern code and did not mind making enemies in following his path. His relations with the Jangamas i.e., Vira Saiva preachers came in for a lot of criticism. It was one of his vows to tolerate anything from them and overlook their excesses. A Jangama to him was Lord Siva incarnate. The Gods cannot be called to account for their deeds. Some of these Jangams did not live high moral lives as Basveswara did. There grew up in Kalyan a class of profligate Saiva preachers called 'Minda Jangams'. Some of the stories concerning them might be only fictions, invented in order to prove the extreme respect that Basava had for the Jangam class. There is a story that the leader once ordered his wife to give up her Sari in the open court to a profligate Jangam who asked for it in order to present it to his low mistress.

But far more dangerous than the Minda Jangams were some of the prominent collaborators of Sri Basveswara. These were Vira Saiva devotees who were resolute men but extremely narrow in vision. They made life very hot for other citizens. The Jains of Kalyan were generally the targets of their high handed behaviour. King Bijjala had some leanings towards Jainism. The Chenna Basava Purana calls him a Jain by religion. Vira Saiva Bhaktas usually took some extraordinary vows, viz not to have anything to do by way of social relations with non-Vira Saivas whom they denounced as Bhavis. It appears that Basveswara himself would not allow any one into his inner court who did not wear the Linga on one's body. Vira Saivas like Ekanta Ramayya, Kinnara Brahmayya, Madivalu Machayya broke the law of the state freely and disturbed the peace of the subjects of Bijjala. Ekanta Ramayya made a fearful wager to offer his head to prove that Siva is the only God. He performed this miraculously and regained his head each time he cut it off. At the end of the wager he caused many Jaina temples to be raised to the ground. Madivalu Macha was a washerman. He vowed that he would not wash the clothes of any except Vira Saivas. Not only that, he vowed that no Bhavi should cross his path when he returned with ironed clothes. If one should be so unfortunate as to come in his way he would kill him on the spot. One day he put into practice his terrible vow on an innocent passerby. The king having come to know of it sent his officers to arrest him. Madivalu killed all of them and slew the king's elephant. Enraged at this Bijjala sent for Sri Basaveswara and remonstrated with him on the high handedness of his adherents. Minister Basava supported the action of Machayya and argued that Vira Saivas could not brook the violation of their vows. Though a forced reconciliation was made the relations of King and Minister were embittered.

Genius though he was in organisation Sri Basaveswara fell into the common error of identifying his religious brotherhood, with the whole State. He set one section of the people, the Vira Saivas above the state altogether and was forgetful of the rights of other citizens. Like Thomas Becket the Minister of Henry II of England he placed the religious community over the civil. Thus he sowed the seeds of disruption of the Kalachuri State. King Bijjala appears to be on the whole a constitutional monarch. He observed the harm, being done to his kingdom and subjects by Basava's policies but did not dispense with his Minister. Sri Basaveswara was already a great force to count with in the state and the King dared not oppose him.

More than the religious tenets of Vira Saivism the social revolution effected by Basaveswara took his non-Saiva contemporaries by surprise. Even from his childhood the great reformer condemned caste distinctions and actively lived upto his ideal in his life. He encouraged interdining amongst the Vira Saivas. The Prasada i.e. food offered to the Jangams was considered sacred and Vira Saivas were enjoined to take prasada from the lowest irrespective of caste. In fact it was a positive sin to enquire about the caste of a Bhakta. True to his ideal Sri Basaveswara had among his close followers a devotee of the untouchable class named Siva Nagamayya. The great minister of the state openly went out in the streets of Kalyan hand in hand with Siva Nagamayya. The non-Saivas were shocked and complained to the King that his minister was trying to introduce 'Varna Sankara' destroying caste regulations and that he ate in the dishes of the lowest people. Bijjala sent for Basava and remonstrated with him where upon the religious leader replied in his fiery way. Having referred in scorn to the ways of the Brahmins in trying to lift up some low people into a higher caste for the sake of money he continued "These are the real untouchables who call Bhaktas as Pariahs. How do you heed their words. Who made these caste distinctions, the Vedas or some fate above. There are only two classes according to the Veda the 'Pravartaka and Nivartaka'. Pravartakas are those who believe in Karma etc. Nivartakas are the devotees of Siva. Hence the so called eighteen castes are but the creations of yesterday. How can you compare a Vira Saiva devotee to a Bhavi. Can the village pig match the mighty elephant. Not all Brahmins put together can equal great Siva Nagamayya". Basava silenced criticism by showing some miracle.

Sri Basaveswara worked many such miracles in his life. His followers were not behind him in this respect. In fact that was the argument par excellence with the men of the day and Basava often pressed it into use. Seeing his extraordinary ways and perhaps jealous of his influence other ministers complained to the king against Basaveswara that he squandered away state money on his profligate Jangams. The king called his minister to render an account which Basava did by his miraculous powers and the state money was in tact to the last pie. Basava's stern code for the Maheswaras led to a quarrel with a class of people of Kalyan called the Boyas. They had some strength in the state. According to former tradition they were entitled to partake of the food offered in the temples to God Siva. Basaveswara ordered that it should not go to them as in his opinion those who were not Vira Maheswaras had no right to touch the food dedicated to Siva. A quarrel ensued and the Boyas petitioned the King to restore their customary rights. Basaveswara was adamant. If these men wanted to partake of the Lord's food they must be equally prepared to partake of everything offered to Lord Siva. He would that day offer poison to the Lord as Nivedya. "Are these men ready to taste this food?" he said. The Boyas rashly replied that if Basava would taste it himself they would follow suit. Then the great Basaveswara rose to the height of his indignation, got all deadly poisons to be compounded into one draught. He offered it to the Lord and drank it without hesitation. It appears that by his miraculous powers he made hundreds of his followers partake of this dish of poison and all of them remained safe. The rude Boyas trembled at this and withdrew their petition.

The gulf between King and minister yawned deeper and deeper as time passed. Perhaps each wanted to get rid of the other by fair or foul means. The cup of dissensions was filled when King Bijjala took drastic action against two of the followers of Basava whom he caused to be blinded for some unknown offence. Where upon Sri Basaveswara decided to forsake the city of Kalyan as a city unfit for Vira Maheswaras. The Basava purana does not say whether the King consented to it. Possibly he felt relieved at the prospect of being rid of the dangerous element in the state. Sri Basaveswara uttered a curse against the city of Kalyan that it would soon lie in ruins and departed thence accompanied by his Vira Saiva Bhaktas. Clever politician that he was Basava pre-arranged the Drama of destruction to be enacted in Kalyan after his departure. There was one powerful commander in the state named Jagadeva Dandanayaka. He once offended Basaveswara by feeding the Brahmins before Basava arrived for a dinner. The leader was all wrath with him. When Jagadeva entreated Basava for pardon he enjoined him, 'Shortly there will grow up treason in this city against Siva. You should kill the enemy of Siva which will be sufficient atonement for this present sin. This is a work dear to the heart of Vira Saiva Bhaktas".

Soon after Sri Basaveswara left Kalyan, a pall of gloom set over the city. There were ominous scenes that betokened impending doom to the place. Many a supernatural warning came to the inhabitants. Most of them left the town in hot haste. There was tumult in the city but the cause was unknown. There was panic every where. Jagadeva Dandanayaka still hesitated to seize the opportunity to execute the work entrusted to him by Basava. But the commander's mother, an old lady, rebuked him on his vacillation. Jagadeva summoned courage and went to Bijjala's court one night accompanied by some others. In the open hall they attacked the king and killed him with their swords. That was the signal for bloody acts in Kalyan and a political revolution. Perhaps the Jains and the remnants of Vira Saivas started a communal war and soon the smiling city of Kalyan lay writhing in blood and tears. Thus was the curse of Basaveswara fulfilled in dead earnest. The Basava Purana says that the sons of Bijjala fought amongst themselves for the Kingdom and died in the revolution. But history speaks otherwise. The sons of Bijjala did continue to rule for some time longer. Bijjala was killed about 1167 A.D. Someswara and Sankama, the sons of Bijjala ruled their kingdom upto 1182 A.D. and after that the Kalachuri dynasty became extinct. The Yadavas from the north and the Hoyasalas from the south appropriated their dominions.

About the time that Kalyan was in the fell grip of internal revolution Sri Basaveswara retired to his favourite Lord, Kudali Sangameswara. Having listened to the destruction of Kalyan Basaveswara decided to depart this mortal body and prayed to Lord Sangameswara to call him back to him. The Lord listened to his prayer and Sri Basaveswara, the great prophet was taken into the body of Lord Kudali Sangama. His devout friends uttered this funeral speech on him "Just as the whirl wind is born and melts away in the wind Sri Basaveswara is born in the Lord and entered the Lord. Like the roaring wave in the ocean he entered the ocean of the Lord".

The Telugu Basava Purana of Palkuriki Somanatha is thus the earliest literary record about the life of great prophet Sri Basaveswara. It is fairly historical and stands to the test of modern criticism. Telugu Basava Purana was translated into the Kanarese language by one Bhimakavi in the later half of the 14th century A.D. There is another Basava Purana in Telugu but it is only Palkuriki's work put into a new garb, the metre only differing. By the time this was written even Palkuriki Somanatha became an object of worship and devotion. Miraculous powers came to be attributed to him also. The Jains left an account of King Bijjala and the name of the work is ~~Bijjala-racharita~~ ~~5-5-11-1004~~. The testimony of the Jains would be naturally hostile to the life and mission of Sri Basaveswara. They represented him as having fled to the wrath of King Bijjala and that he was pursued by his son Palkuriki Soma paid a tribute to Basaveawara in his Pandita-radya-charita also

Was the life of Basaveswara a historical fact? There need be no doubt on this score. The very existence of the Lingayat brotherhood is a living testimony to the work of Sri Basava. Strangely there is no inscriptional evidence to the personality of so phenomenal a personage as Basava. Yet one of his close associates named Ekanta Ramayya was mentioned in the Abluru inscription dated 1195 A.D. The miracle of his cutting off of his head and regaining it was narrated in this inscription. Among the contemporaries of Sri Basava may be mentioned Mallikarjuna Panditaradhyaya. The Pandit's Siva-tattva-Sara refers to the feat of Basava in drinking poison and remaining safe. In matters of philosophy Vira Saivism approaches the Visista Advaita, the system of qualified monism. The Saiva teachers of Andhradesa were unwilling to give up the Vedas and the system of caste. The words of Pandit Mallikarjuna were characteristic. He is reported to have exclaimed, "Oh Basava Linga! I cannot renounce Bhakti, neither can I part company from Brahminhood".

ROMAN TRADE WITH THE DECCAN

BY

DR B A SALETORÉ, M A , D. PHIL
(GIESSEN) PH D (LONDON)

THE object of this paper is to show that in the last quarter of the first century B C and in the first quarter of the first century A D there was close commercial contact between the Deccan and the Roman Empire. The Roman Emperor in whose reign this commercial intercourse took place was the well-known Octavius, better known as Augustus. He ruled from August the 19th B C 19 till August the 19th A D. 14¹

THE EARLIEST LITERARY EVIDENCE ABOUT the intercourse between the Deccan and the Roman world during the reign of Emperor Augustus is in the GEOGRAPHY of Strabo. This native of Amasia in the interior of Pontus, was contemporary of that monarch as well as of Emperor Trajan² In Book XV Strabo writes thus "The merchants of the present day who sail from Egypt to India by the Nile and the Arabian Gulf have seldom made a voyage as far as the Ganges. They are ignorant men and unqualified for writing an account of the places they have visited. From one place in India and from one king, Pandian, but according to other writers, Poros, there came to Caesar Augustus gifts and an embassy accompanied by the Indian Sophist who committed himself to the flames at Athens, like Kalanos, who had exhibited a similar spectacle in presence of Alexander"³

In a later context Strabo, citing the author Nikolaos Damaskenos, writes the following — "This writer says that at Antioch by Daphne (which was a famous sanctuary of Apollo in the city of Antioch, the capital of Syria), he met with the Indian, who had been sent to Augustus Caesar. It appeared from the letter that their number had been more than merely the three he reports that he saw. The rest had died chiefly in consequence of the length of the journey. The letter was written in Greek on parchment and imported that Poros was the writer, and that though he was the sovereign of 600 kings, he nevertheless set a high value on being Caesar's friend, and was willing to grant him a passage whenever he wished through his dominions, and to assist him in any good enterprise. Such, he says, were the contents of the letter. Eight naked servants presented the gifts that were brought. They had girdles encircling their waists, and were fragrant with ointments". We are told in this account that they were accompanied by "Zarmanochegas," a native of Baragosa, who died on the funeral pyre, as mentioned above, at Athens ⁴

The Indian ambassador is mentioned by Suetonius in his life of Emperor Augustus thus — "The Indians also, and the Scythians, who were known only by report, he attracted to solicit voluntarily, through ambassador, the friendship of himself and the Roman people". ⁵

Florus, another Roman historian, towards the end of his EPITOME OF ROMAN HISTORY, mentions the same embassy thus — "For both Scythians and the Sarmatians sent ambassadors begging our alliance. The Seres also and the Indians who live under the Sun, together with jewels and precious stones, bringing elephants also amongst their presents, reckoned so much an obligation laid upon the Emperor, as the length of their journey, which they had finished in four years, and notwithstanding the complexion of the men showed that they came from another climate" ⁶

The date of this embassy cannot be fixed from the above accounts. The age when Strabo wrote his famous GEOGRAPHY cannot be determined. All that we know is that he lived also in the reign of Emperor Trajan in A.D. 21, and that he may have died three years later in A.D. 24 ⁷. Suetonius' account is placed by McCrindle in circa 21 ⁸. Florus wrote in the days of Emperor Trajan ⁹.

The exact date of the Indian embassy, however, is given by Dion Cassius, in his HISTORY OF ROME in the following words — "Numerous embassies came to him (Emperor Augustus at Samos, B.C. 21), and the Indians having first proclaimed a league of amity with him, obtained its ratification, and presented to him, besides other gifts, with tigers also animals seen there for the first time by the Romans, and if I mistake not, even by the Greeks" ¹⁰

5 McCrindle, Ibid, p. 78, n. (2)

8 McCrindle, op cit, p. 78 n. (2).

9 Ibid, p. 213

10. Ibid, pp. 79, 212.

But Dion Cassius was not a contemporary writer, since he was born in about A D 155, and since in his HISTORY OF ROME the events till A D 229 are mentioned¹¹ This latter fact might enable us to assign his work to about A D 200

Whatever our difficulty in fixing the exact date of the Indian embassy to the Roman Emperor Augustus, we may note the articles which the Indian king is reputed to have sent to the Roman Emperor. Florus mentions, among other things, jewels and precious stones,¹² while Dion Cassius, as given above, tigers Neither precious stones nor tigers could be said to have been specialties of northern India Hence we have to dispense with the idea that, notwithstanding the name Porus of the Indian king, who is said to have sent the embassy to Emperor Augustus, the presents could ever have come from northern India. It is more probable that it was a monarch of the Deccan who sent the embassy to the Roman ruler This will be evident from the identification of one kind of precious stones sent to Emperor Augustus, about which we have evidence in the BIBLE and in the writings of Pliny¹³ But before I describe this article of trade, I may mention that the identity of the Indian king, who sent an embassy to Emperor Augustus, cannot be made out for the present for want of sufficient historical data It is not unlikely that that Indian monarch of the Deccan may have been a ruler of the Andhriabhritya or the Satavahana House

The most unique precious stones which enable us to assign the Deccan trade with Rome to the reign of the Emperor Augustus are the beryls and the opals About the beryl, the following is mentioned in the BIBLE This is in connection with the Prince of Tyrus "Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of God, every precious stone was thy covering, the sardius, topaz, and the diamond, the beryl, the onyx, and the jasper, the sapphire, the emerald, and the carbuncle, and gold the workmanship of thy tabrets and of thy pipes was prepared in thee in the day that thou wast created"¹⁴

Pliny in his NATURAL HISTORY (Book XXXVII) writes thus—"The Indians take a marvellous pleasure in beryls that are distinguished by their great length, and say that these are the only precious stones which they prefer to wear without gold, and hence, after piercing them, they string them upon elephant bristles. It is agreed that these beryls which are of perfect quality should not be perforated, but should merely be clasped at their extremities with circlets of gold. They prefer therefore to cut them into the form of a cylinder rather than to set them as precious since those that are of greatest length are most in fashion. Some are of opinion that beryls are naturally angular, and that piercing them adds to their splendour in consequence of the removal of the white substance within, while the reflection of the gold still further heightens their brilliancy, and their thickness no longer mars their transparency... The Indians by colouring crystals have found a way of imitating a variety of precious stones, especially beryls".¹⁵

Now where was this particular region from where the beryls were mined and sent to the Roman Empire? The answers to this question is to be found in the GEOGRAPHY of Ptolemy, who lived in the middle of the second century A.D. While describing the inland cities between the Pseudostomos and the Baris, he mentions a place called Pounnata, "where is beryl".¹⁶ This place has been rightly identified by scholars with punnata, an ancient kingdom that is well-known in the history of the Deccan as the Punnata Six-thousand Province. It comprised all the country draining to the river Kabbani or the Kapini in the Heggade-devana taluka in the southern regio of the Mysore State. Its capital was Kirttipura.¹⁷

The whole kingdom of Punnata, therefore, according to Ptolemy, was celebrated for beryls. To this kingdom belonged a great part of the modern district of Coimbatore, as is proved by the fact that a copper plate of one of the Punnata rulers was found in that district as early as 1883.¹⁸ In the district of modern Coimbatore was a locality of considerable importance, from the point of the trade which the Deccan had with the Roman Empire. This locality is called Padiyur, of Pattiyali, in the Dharapuram taluka of the Coimbatore district. Here, as Walhouse correctly maintained many years ago in 1876, was a mine which produced beryls.¹⁹ This assumption of Walhouse is amply proved by two considerations. Firstly, a large find of Roman coins sufficiently proves that that region traded with the Roman world.²⁰ Secondly in 1798 a mine of beryls was secretly worked out by the people of Padiyur, and in 1819-20 a European planter having got news of 17 On a complete account of this kingdom, read B. A. Saletore, India Culture, III, pp 303-317. Rice, ofcourse, had earlier identified Pounnata of Photency with Punnata in the Mysore State. See his Mysore and Coorg from the Inscriptions, pp. 10, 146.

this, rented the well, and obtained during one year (1819-1820) 2196 beryls valued at £s 1201. The mine, we are told, became exhausted and water broke in.²¹

Thus both numismatic evidence and their abundant existence in the modern age prove that beryls have been a speciality of Padiyur, and that they were an important article of trade between the Deccan and the Roman Empire. But we have yet to show that the whole of the Punnata region, or a large part of the southern portion of the Mysore State, traded with the Roman Empire during the reign of Emperor Augustus. This is furnished by the many Roman coins gold and silver, called dinarii found in the whole region.²²

But Padiyur seems to have also produced another class of precious stones, which has been noticed by Pliny. He writes thus: 'Opals are at once very like and very unlike beryls, and are inferior in value to emeralds alone. India, too, is the sole mother of these precious stones, thus completing her glory as being the great producer of the most costly gems.'²³ In a later context, Pliny makes the following observation about the same precious stone called opal: "Paedorios of the finest quality is found in India, where it is called sangemon."²⁴

Since opals "are at once very like and very unlike beryls", it is not improbable that they were mined in the same region which produced the beryls. Now the name of this locality seems as given by Pliny is Paedorios which is nothing but the Romanized method of expressing the word Padiyur to which the suffix os has been added, as in other instances. This would mean that Padiyur itself produced beryls as well as opals, both being, according to Pliny, "verylike and very unlike" each other. The whole region called the Punna takindgom, therefore, was known in the Roman world as the locality that produced beryls, while Padiyur itself was celebrated for its opals.

A Calukyan Patron of Northern Buddhism A-Note.

BY

R N SALETORE, M. A., PH D., D LITT

IN the work entitled Kau-fa-kao-sang-chuen, which has² been attributed to I-Tsing, who is stated to have translated it during A.D 700-712,¹ we find the following statement "To the north-east of the great Bodhi (Gunacarita—the temple just named) about a couple of stages is another temple called Calukya. This is the one which was formerly built by a king of the Calukyan kingdom in South India. This temple though poor is remarkable for the religious life of its inmates. In more recent times a king called Jih-Kwan (Sun-Army-Adityasena) built a new temple by the side of the old one, which is now getting finished, and in which many priests from the south take their residence." From this extract we learn that Hwui Lun, who, according to I-Tsing, appears to have visited the above mentioned holy places, found a Calukyan temple which was built by a Calukyan ruler. The object of this note is to ascertain who possibly this ruler was and in which year this shrine was built. In this connection it has been observed that "there is a curious reference to the Chalukyas and king Jihkwan (Sunarmy²) in the extract cited above. I have already explained in another connection the implication of the reference to the Later Gupta ruler Sun-Army (Adityasena) and in this case the reference to the Calukyas can hardly be called "curious" if we examine the political issues concerned

1 IA X, p 110 Cf Another version of this passage by Beal — "Two stages to the east of the Mohabodhi (North of the Ganges) is a temple called Kru-lu-Ka (Beal thought that it stood for the Kurucountry, f n. 1 Intr p XXVI) was built long ago by a king of the Kru-lu-Ka country, a southern kingdom (Kurukshetra ?) Although poor, this establishment is strict in its teaching. Recently a king called Jih-Kwan, Sun-Army (Adityasena) built by the side of the old temple another which is now nearly finished." Beal, intro Life of Huen Tsang, P XXVI Beal later corrected the word Kru-lu-ka to Calukya, as it was known in the seventh century Cf IA VIII, p 241 The earlier variants of the word were — (a) Calukya — A. D 578 (IA VI, p 363, (b) Calukya, IA XIX, p - 16), c (Calukya)—Nerur grant of Mangalesa — undated—(IA VII, p. 162 also see Ibid, VI, p 73, XIX, p 309, IX, pp 127, 130); (d) Calukya-A D 634-35—IA VIII, p 241 For variations in the family name see IA XX, p 95, also see Fleet, Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, pp 336-37 These variants do not give any clue to the assertion that "The Sulikas were probably the Chalukyas Sulikas may have been another dialectic variant" Raychaudhuri, Political History of Ancient India, p 509, (4th ed) The Calukyas were never known as the Sulikas nor does the Kannada Language ever offer such a variation. The Sulikas appear to have been quite a different people altogether Cf S. Srikanta Sastri, Sulakas and Mulakas, J A H R S, II, no 2, pp 178-180.

2. Raychaudhuri, Political History of Ancient India, p. 517 f n. 1,

We are told by I-Tsing that Hwui Lun visited Mahabodhi and there he happened to notice a Calukyan temple which he specifically styles as having been built by a Calukyan ruler of the south, quite a long time before he visited that place. It is admitted that Hwui Lun must have visited Mahabodhi and Nalanda some time in the last quarter of the seventh century.³ Therefore as he does not specify the precise period when the temple in question was raised, it can only be maintained that it must have been built quite a number of years prior to Hwui Lun's visit to that locality.

We may therefore inquire whether in Calukyan history we can find any ruler who made incursions into the Uttārapatha especially in or around the regions of the Ganges and whether, in the circumstances, the structure concerned could have been built by him. In the Mahakuta pillar inscription we are informed that Kirtivarman I was victorious over the kings of Vanga, Anga, Kalinga, Vattura, Magadha and Madyaka.⁴ Fleet discounted these epithets as mere boasts but not without specifying any good reason.⁵ His successor Mangalesa, another intrepid conqueror, followed in this ruler's inspiring foot-steps and made apparently two successful incursions into the Uttārapatha. Two records tell us quite clearly that Mangalesa made possibly two incursions into the northern regions where he decisively defeated the Kalacuriya ruler Buddharaja. The Mahakuta inscription, dated the 21st October A.D. 602 reveals to us that the following actions were performed by Mangalesa: "And He (Mangalesa)-having set (his) heart upon the conquest of the northern region (and) having conquered king Buddha (and) having taken possession of all his substance (and) with an eager desire to set up a pillar of victory of his own prowess on the bank of the river Bhagrathi (Ganges),⁶ having determined in (his) mind that in the first place there should be set up the prowess of a pillar of victory of religion."⁷ As though in confirmation of the above exploit Mangalesa's undated Nerur grant states that "he (Mangalesa) had driven out king Buddha, who was the son of Sankaragana, and who was possessed of the power of elephants, and horses and treasure,"⁸ From the above grants we may draw the following

3 Cf. Jayaswal, Imperial History of India, p. 69. He places the date of this pilgrim's visit to Magadha in "about 690 A.D."

4 I.A. XIX, p. 19.

5 Fleet, Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, pp. 344-46. In the circumstances I suggested elsewhere that (See Life in the Gupta Age, p. 86) if these boasts had any truth in them then possibly Kirtivarman I might have enjoyed some victories over the Gupta emperor Bhanu Gupta Baladitya III. Jayaswal surmised that this Calukyan shrine was 'probably' built by Vijayaditya. Cf. Imperial History of India, p. 69. This view does not appear to be acceptable.

6 I.A. XIX, p. 10.

7 Ibid., p. 16.

8 Ibid., VII, p. 162.

conclusions (a) that in the year A.D. 602 an inscription commemorated the Calukyan king Mangalesa's invasion of Buddha raja's northern regions, (b) that Mangalesa actually went into the Gangetic doab; (c) that he also raised a memorial column of victory in celebration of his triumph over Buddharaja.

Now of course the above mentioned grants do not record the fact that Mangalesa either built or gave any donation to any Buddhist monks but it nevertheless records the important fact that he was definitely the first Calukyan ruler who visited the northern region around the Gangetic delta where he seems to have raised a column of triumph. If this event of Mangalesa's invasion of the Uttarapatha took place in the year A.D. 602, then it is not strange to learn that towards the end of the century we find that a traveller like Hwui Lun should have found a Calukyan donated Buddhist monastery the donor of which was not naturally remembered. It is probable that Mangalesa was the donor of that monastery first, because he was the first, Calukyan monarch who actually went into the Gangetic region, secondly, he seems to have been also a builder, having built a victory pillar on the banks of the Ganges. Of course, it may be stated that he, being a Vaisnavite, might not necessarily have been the donor. To this it may be said that most of the early Gupta emperors, who were the patrons of the celebrated Nalanda monastery, were, not all Buddhists, and on this analogy it need not necessarily be maintained that, though a Vaisnavite, Mangalesa should not be construed to have been the patron of a Buddhist vihara in north-eastern India which he visited in all likelihood in or about A.D. 602.

We may therefore inquire whether Mangalesa ever built any Buddhist cave temple at all especially within his own dominions. We know for example from the cave inscription in the verandah of cave No. III that the cave temples at Badami were built in the 12th year of his reign⁹ by Mangalesa, namely in saka 500—A.D. 578.¹⁰ It is extremely interesting to note that in this very cave appears a bas-relief, representing the Bodhisattva Padmapani, which is badly injured.¹¹ If Mangalesa could dedicate a cave temple to the worship of the Buddha in a group of shrines dedicated to Saiva as well as Vaisnava deities,¹² there is no reason why he should not have granted an endowment for the establishment of a Buddhist monastery in northern India.

A Glimpse of South India : Sankara to Ramanuja

BY

S SRIKANTAYA, B A B L , (BANGALORE CITY)

HISTORY is not a mere chronicle of kings and queens but an account of a people, their manners and customs, social life, political awakening, and their contribution to the current philosophical thought during a particular period. Two great religious reformers of outstanding eminence, Sri Sankara and Sri Ramanuja furnish the landmarks for obtaining a comprehensive idea of the kind of the intellectual and social life of the people in South India or the Deccan and they have made in themselves a remarkable contribution to the philosophical thought of the world. This period from about the seventh to the twelfth centuries enables us to obtain a glimpse of South India, during a most progressive phase of its history when giant strides were made in the Hindu religious thought from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, from Kailasa to Kanchi.

Amongst the most stalwart critics and dissenters of Hinduism and the Vedic religion of the time encrusted with ritual and sacrifice were two contemporary reformers, Gautama Buddha and Mahavira, belonging to the seventh and sixth centuries B C. Buddhism and Jainism in the course of centuries remoulded the Hindu religious thought and modified the Vedic sacrifice and ritual, while Buddhism itself got slowly absorbed into it by Buddha's being recognised as an avatar of Visnu.

Whatever the course of Buddhism in the plains of the Indus and the Ganges, in the Deccan Buddhism was never a serious rival to other religious faiths prevalent in the country. But Jainism attained great influence at court and in the country, and the Hindus resolved on renovating their philosophical and religious system in order to re-establish Hinduism on a universally acceptable intellectual basis.

The Gupta Emperors in the North and the Vakatakas in the Deccan took up boldly the cause of Vedic sacrifices and prided in their inscriptions as re-establishers of the Vedic cult of sacrifice and prayer. The mantle of the Vakatakas fell on the early Calukyas of Badami, who delighted in the performance of Vedic rituals and fighting down, intellectually, rival creeds, for as we know the Gangas and the Kadambas were generous supporters of Jainism in the Deccan. Under the aegis of the Calukyas, Brahmanism took up the defence of the Vedic cult. Kumarila Bhatta the earliest champion of the orthodox religion, lived in the country ruled by the Calukyas and Kumarila's disciple was the great champion of Vedic Hinduism of Sankaracharya who lived in the seventh century beyond any question.

The Calukyan sculptures at Badami, their boar crest and other symbols all tend to confirm that view of the birth of what Sister Nivedita called "Aggressive Hinduism". The Calukyas were stout, staunch Saivites and the Rastrakutas were firm Vaisnavites, including Nripatunga Amogha Varsha, who was a great worshipper of Mahalakshmi.

The Pallavas were championing Hinduism in the South. Saint Appar and Sundar and Manicka Vachakar sang through the country the glory of Siva and they crushed mercilessly vestiges of Jainism in the South. Thus Sankara inherited a great tradition, the cause of Vedic religion, modified by the Saivite Bhakti cult in South India.

Sankara took his stand on the Prasthanatraya—the Vedas, the Brahma Sutras, and the Bhagavat Gita, as the bed rock of his philosophy, appealing to the ancient Upanisads for his authority. According to him, Brahman is the universal soul of the world and also a personal God; there is a periodical creation and absorption in the never ending cycle of the creation but Brahman is unknowable except by concentration on Yoga; there is no plurality of souls and complete liberation is attained by the soul through Brahman and Him alone. He was a most uncompromising monistic teacher expounding new formulas. While he emphasised on Jnana or knowledge of the Supreme spirit as the chief object of man's endeavours here on earth, he did not go to the extent of rejecting all the other means of attaining that purpose. He regarded as unnecessary the Vedic sacrifice and sacerdotalism and shed fresh light on Vedanta. He established several Mutts throughout the country and his work has been carried on after him by his successors. With the practical acceptance and wide adoption of the Bhagavat Gita and its comprehensive philosophy and the Bhaktimarga or the path of love and devotion to God as an open protest against the atheists or the Buddhists, the most prevalent forms of the Vedanta faith were re-consolidated by the co-ordinating ideas.

The Alvars and Nayanars had always laid stress on the doctrine of Bhakti as a means to attain salvation through Visnu or Siva Rastrakuta Kings were great Vaisnavites. Rastrakutas with their Garuda symbols were Vaisnavites. Some later Pallava kings were admirers of Vaisnavism as the Vaikunthaperumal temple at Kanchi will testify. Ramanuja was born in the centre of the later Vaisnava Pallavas near Madras. Ramanuja expounded the Visistadvaita philosophy, converted the Hoysala King Bittideva, who became known as Visnu Vardhadana and consecrated the temple at Melkote, etc. and entered Samadhi about 1137 A.D. According to traditional accounts he lived for over 120 years. To the Visistadvaitin as to the Advaitin the Vedas and the smritis are the sole and independent authority for the knowledge of the Brahman and reason has no operation except in matters perceptible by the senses. While Sankara accepted the smritis and srutis as authorities until oneness is realised Ramanuja considered them as always authoritative and as expressive of the eternal commands of the deity, whose breath they are said to be. With Sankara the ordained duties are compulsory only till an individual has realised his unity with God, but for Ramanuja the performance of such duties is obligatory as long as life and physical power endure. Ramanuja laid great emphasis on devotion to Narayana and announced to the whole world that all are entitled to attain Him regardless of birth and caste. He preached in short the fatherhood of Visnu and the motherhood of Lakshmi to mankind. His guru was a non-brahmin for whom food was served in the Brahminical house of Sri Ramanuja himself. His opening of the Melkote and Belur temples to the Antyajas or untouchables is indicative of his great reforming outlook and his zeal and successful endeavour to knit Hindus together into a strong fraternal bond.

After Ramanuja, Hoysala kings took up the cause of Visnu without any intolerance to Siva or Jaina, as recent researches have shown, contradicting the earlier view of Jaina persecution by the rulers in the Hoysala country. Their grand and magnificent temples at Belur, Somanathapur and elsewhere are land marks in the history of neo-Hinduism.

It will thus be seen that when emphasis on animal sacrifice and enormous ritual connected with these sacrifices was resented by the more thoughtful and leading people of all classes it became necessary to reform and re-orient the old religion to meet the needs and requirements of the day. People wanted a religion which they could understand and follow, i.e. a comprehensive and practical and realistic religion and they got it.

The Colas were ardent champions of Siva, from the time of Karikala and Aditya. Their numerous benefactions to the Nataraja temple at Chidambaram and the Rajarajeswara temple at Tanjore evince their love towards uncompromising Saivism. Rajaraja invited Saivite scholars from the North to give renewed vigour to the South Indian Saivism. His zeal was taken up by the Veera-saivas of the Karnataka country. It is beyond doubt that Tamil Saivite literature and the Tamil saints exercised profound influence on the Lingayats. Disregard for the Vedas and the caste restrictions, and intolerance towards Visnu were their chief traits. Tamil Peria Puram (lives of Saints) was translated into Kannada and Tamil Manu Cola is the hero of Rajasekharacharita.

To the followers of Basava Deccan owes its birth of Kannada prose, simple, vigorous and terse, appealing to the masses. It saved the lower classes from falling into the folds of Islam or Christianity. It is a fine example of the aggressive Hinduism of the Middle ages.

Sankara to Ramanuja is a period of the great "definition" in Hinduism, a period of the Dharmasastra attaining its final shape. Mitakshara and Hemadri laid down the daily conduct of the Hindu in all his multifarious aspects. While Hemadri explained and elaborated the religious and domestic life of the Hindus, Mitakshara expounded and explained the civil and political relations of the Hindu.

Thus a renaissance was sweeping over the Deccan in religion and politics. Art was not neglected. The writings of Kumarila, Gaudapada, Suresvara, Nathamuni, Yamunacharya and Ramanuja are amongst the highest expositions of the neo-Hinduism.

South Indian temples represent solidification of South Indian religious thought. Their art is not representing the repose and calmness of Buddhism. In consonance with the renascent spirit of Hinduism, iconography was developed. Kanchi saw the earliest, complete Hindu temple and its offshoot and image was the world famous Kailasa of Ellora. Here the multi armed gods and goddesses, trampling down evils or transplanting their spears through asuras, symbolise the new spirit surging through the heart of the Deccan Hindus for examples Ravana lifting Kailasa, was the typical of the Hindus of the South. In the cause of their religion nothing was too great or too heavy to the Hindus to attempt or to perform. They were willing to do or die to save their religion. Hindus can be certainly proud of the day when some of their great rulers like Rajaraja or Rajendra Cola, the Rastrakuta Krsna and Calukya Vikramaditya VI, tall intellectual giants, were able to wield swords as well as their pen.

Kings of this period were true to the Ksatriya tradition taught in the Bhagavat Gita. Duty to the state, i.e. their Dharma was their watch-word. They laboured ceaselessly to promote Aryan Daharma They would fight even their kith and kin if they stood in the way of the Rajadharmā. Indeed, Bhagavat Gita was the bible of the kings of this period. That gives the true explanation for the constant warfare waged between the kings of the South amongst themselves and without and but for this background their wars become mere fights for earthly power. With this knowledge of the religious background, their constant rivalry is exalted into the service of God.

We need not start with a feeling that life in this world is ever full of sorrow and pain and misery and that to get out of this grief and pain is necessary the annihilation of the thirst after the pleasing objects of life, by the attainment of Nirvana. Nor need we worry about the metaphysical wranglings regarding the nature of the Brahman or the destiny of the soul, but we must free human life from the net of over-wrought metaphysics as much as from the redundant over-growth of ritualism. Religion then must be controlled from the aesthetic standpoint to counteract gnostic influences. What is required is an authoritative commandment and justification of morality and unselfishness more satisfactorily than Buddhism could ever prove them to be. Merely establishing the divine authority of the Vedas and their ever-lasting character could not produce this result. Hence Hindu scriptures embodying the Hindu tradition and rebutting the ethics of Buddhism expounded and expatiated on the Upanisadic doctrines. By this means, the Vedas came back to their own position and continue as such to this day. The effect of these teachings from Sankara to Ramanuja and the hundreds of saints and religious reformers was to give an increasing importance to the indigenous religious systems of the land and reinvigorate them.

Jainism well agreed with Buddhism in considering a state of impassive abstraction as supreme felicity and the Jaina doctrines are mostly those in common with the Hindus. They deny the existence of at least the activity and providence of God in believing in the eternality of matter, in the worship of deified saints, in their scrupulous care of the Animal life, and all the precautions which it leads to in their having no hereditary priest-hood, in disclaiming the divine authority of the Vedas, and in having no sacrifice, and no respect for fire but they have got the caste system and numerous divisions. The Jains attained their highest prosperity in the eighth and ninth centuries and declined in their influence later on South India.

It is a view more commonly held nowadays that the Indus civilization is definitely non-Aryan and much superior to the Indo-Aryan but it is too soon to say whether it is Dravidian and historically speaking the Rgveda, Yajurveda and the Atharvaveda are very important, the last containing matters relating to pre-Rgvedic times, though later in composition than the other three Vedas. The Upanisads containing esoteric knowledge are par excellence and is summed up in the Mahavakya Tat-Tvam-asi (That art Thou) and most of the Upanisads are pre-Buddhistic and together with the Brahma sutras and the Bhagavat-Gita are termed the prasthanatraya. The Upanisads may be described as the literature of spiritual power appealing to man, irrespective of climes and ages. They embody the thought-power of the Ksatriyas and the Brahmanas and are the fountain-head of Vedanta philosophy.

The caste system may be traced to the initial segregation of the conquerors from the conquered and a subsequent division among the conquerors themselves as civilization advanced. In the earlier days the caste system was not so rigid as it afterwards became. We have the example of Visvamitra becoming a Brahmarisi. There is the instance of the acceptance of Satyakama Jabala, as a sage, the son of a dasi by unknown father, because he spoke the truth.

Buddha accepted many doctrines of Brahmanism and emphasised on self, reason and ethics for its ethical propagation. Jainism had the Triratnas right faith, right knowledge and right conduct corresponding to the Buddhist eight-fold path. It was the religious inquest of the Buddha and Mahavira that created a stir in the dovecotes of Brahmin orthodoxy and promoted other religious movements. Their appeal to the ahimsa instinct of man was wider than the circle of their followers. The opposition of their personalities to the impersonal rishtis of his Brahminical system had contributed to their success. The bhakti movement founded on ahimsa and adoration of a personal deity set its face against animal sacrifice and ritualism and Saivism and Vaishnavism as we are familiar with, originated during this period. Krsna worship developed at Mathura and its neighbourhood. The threat to Brahmanism by Buddhism and Jainism must have been responsible for the growing rigidity of caste and child marriage came to the fore-front.

South India under the Satavahanas and the Tamil rulers paid special attention to the glorification of the orthodox religion by the performances of Vedic sacrifices without adopting a truculent attitude towards Buddhism or Jainism. This gave further strength to orthodox Brahmanism by an apparent compromise with Saivism and Vaishnavism which brought the two latter into the pale of orthodoxy and consequently even centuries before Christ, Brahmins had reduced the last foothold of Buddhism in the country.

The reorganization of the caste system gave a definite place in Hindu Society to the foreigners who had become permanent residents in this country. The assimilation of the status of women to that of the Sudras was completed and their degradation ensued, and the puranas were intended for the edification of those classes who had been declared incompetent to pursue and study the fundamental religious texts. The subjugation of women was regularised. The theory of unreceptiveness of Indias for Hellenism has been seen to be untenable in the realms of coinage, astronomy, astrology and the fine arts. Predictive astrology as expounded by Varahamihira exhibits a western influence. The travel of Hiuen Tsang gives an account of the social and economic history of India in the seventh century. There was progress in art and town planning.

The Arab conquest of Sindh is regarded as a triumph without results. Though it did not modify Indian life permanently or enrich Indian Culture, the extensive empire of the Arabs facilitated the diffusion in it of Indian thought and science which ultimately reached Europe. Two Indians, Manka and Saleh were the court physicians of the Kaliph Harun al-Rashid who started the Golden Age of Islam. The seventh century marked the period of triumph of Brahmanism with its Siva and Visnu cults and foreshadowed an early decadence of Jainism and Buddhism in the Pallava Empire. The greatness of Kanchi as a seat of Sanskrit learning to which flocked scholars from all parts of the then known world was well-known. It was visited by Hiuen Tsang. Dinnaga's name is associated with it and Bharavi is said to have been invited to his court by Simhavisnu. The famous Rock-cut temples of Pallava architecture have marked the transmission to the Dravidian architecture as well as the Calukyan, with their imposing towers and excellent sculpture.

The unique success of Buddhism was due to the personality and character of the Buddha being properly handed down from generation to generation and embodying the sacred literature of his precepts and teachings. The great renunciation of the Master was the unnumbered virtues of his life which went straight to the hearts of the people who came to know him. With the rise of Mahayanism, the Buddha became divine and again it was his life and personality which conquered the hearts of men and women and the Sangha with its members devoted to spiritual exercises and wedded to poverty and chastity cannot be over-rated and it was a reservoir of spiritual energy and the financial support necessary for propaganda was given by the public. The development of Mahayana made Buddhism popular. The royal support from Asoka to Kaniska transformed it into a world faith. The triumph of Kumarila and Sankara and the incorporation in the oldest religion of some of the best features of Buddhism found its aspects practically gone. In spite of the infallibility of the Vedas, sacrifices did not become conspicuous. Jainism contributed to Indian art, and philosophy and enriched Sanskrit and Kannada, and in some measure Tamil literature.

The most substantial contribution of South India to Hinduism lay in the development of an aggressive Hindu movement which eclipsed Buddhism completely, left the Jainism to decline and gave rise to two great religious reformers Ramanuja and Basava who spread popular Hindu ideas amongst the illiterate and ignorant masses of the land.

While Vedic Hinduism was undergoing modification to suit popular tastes, and at the same time became the dominant religion of the ruling classes, Jainism was forced to take a second seat in the hall of culture. Jainasena, Gunabhadra, Puṣyapada, sharpened their wits and logic to fight the subtle champion of Vedic revivalism, the great Advaitacharya. It was forced even to adopt the themes of the Hindus, though they would not accept their religion and philosophy. To be in tune with the changing, resurging Hinduism, Jains like Pampa and Ranna adopted the story of Ramayana and Mahabharata as themes for their Kannada epics. Indeed they enriched Kannada literature of the period but failed to achieve or recover their foremost place either in politics or in religion. What is more remarkable is that those protestant, un-Aryan religions, condemning Hinduism, ended in copying the Hinduism in its caste system, idol worship and other aspects of a social and political life.

Sankara and Ramanuja. what a glorious period of history these two names sum up. They were the progenitors of modern Hinduism. They rediscovered to us the glory and grandeur of the Vedas, consistently attacked by Buddhists, Jain, Charvakas and other atheists. God was humanised and harmonised with the growing, changing times. Personal God and devotion to Him were emphasised as superior and a shorter cut to salvation than the nihilism of Buddhists.

Erection of grand and artistic palaces for Gods tended to exalt and confirm the Hindu in a belief in his proud inheritance and the more glorious future to come. Their belief produced the virile manhood of India, the Rajput kings of the Deccan, fully reflecting the great undying epic ideals of the Mahabharata and the Bhagavat Gita.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS,

Medieval Section, 1295—1724.

BY

PROFESSOR H K SHERWANI, M A, (Oxon),

F R Hist S, Bar-at-Law,

Head of the Department of History & Political Science, Osmania University, Hyderabad-Dn

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

I consider it a great honour for being called upon to preside over the deliberations of the section of this Conference dealing with the Medieval period of the history of the Deccan and to have an opportunity of addressing a distinguished and learned gathering like this. The responsibility is the greater as this is the first conference of its kind and it will be precedents created during this session which will rule our work in future. I sincerely thank the organisers of Conference for having done me that honour.

What do we mean by the Deccan?

It would almost be tautological to say that the Deccan means South and that we are here today to deliberate over one of the three great periods of the history of a large part of South India. Apart from the fact that in ordinary parlance Deccan proper is differentiated from what is called South India and is taken to mean more the tableland and parts lying within the Dominions of my august master, His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar, it would be interesting to demarcate it further and find out whether it is really a geographical entity or merely a conventional phrase. There is another difficulty, and it is that while the Eastern or the Golconda Coast is not ordinarily regarded a part of the Deccan, the tracts lying on both sides of the spurs of the Western Ghats are called the Bombay Deccan to distinguish them from His Exalted Highness's Dominions which are taken to be the Deccan par excellence.

It would therefore be fruitful to know the boundaries of the territory with which we have to deal before proceeding any further. Perhaps the most noticeable feature of the map of the subcontinent of India, besides the tremendous wall of the Himalayas and its offshoots jutting southwards both in the west and in the east, is a huge equilateral triangle turned upside down with its base running parallel to the Vindhya and the Tropic of Cancer and its apex at Cape Comorin. The structure of the northern part of this triangle is, however, different to the rest, for in Malwa the slope is westwards with the result that the Narmada and the Tapi follow it through narrow mountain valleys and fall into the Arabian Sea, while the slope in the south is definitely towards the east. The unit called the Deccan may therefore be said to commence with the Ajanta Range where the ancient undisturbed rock begins to extend over the centre of the peninsula right up to the Nilgiris and the Palghat Gap. This plateau, which is partly covered by a huge semicircle of ancient lava flow extending like a ten days' moon with one horn at Nagpur and the other at Goa over an area of two million square miles, is remarkable from the geographical point of view. Lava has disintegrated in the course of the millenia into what is termed the black cotton soil which peculiarly retains moisture much longer than any other soil and thus is extremely fertile and productive.

Many historical phenomena can be explained by the presence of this fertile soil, and the struggle for Berar between those who held Malwa and those who held the plateau of the Deccan is explained by the fact that Berar forms almost the pivot of the lavaic crescent and is therefore always the butt of its neighbours. Thus during the period over the section of which it is my privilege to preside today, the struggle centres round Mahur which is just outside Berar, and Kherla which lies just within its boundaries, and this struggle recurs time and again in the wars between Malwa and the Deccan.

These great lavaic uplands end abruptly in the Western Ghats with a sheer fall of nearly 4,000 feet, thus forming a natural barrier for the defence of the homelands of the Marathas, the Desh, from which the race spread first over the lavaic focus from Nagpur to Goa and thence right up to Delhi and Panipat in the north, Bengal in the east and Tanjore in the south. The natural fortress-like territory of the Konkan and the Desh with its mountain ramparts in the east and the great moat of the Arabian Sea in the west was the nursery of a virile race which kept on its independence of the rulers of the Deccan plateau throughout the Medieval period, and may be regarded as falling definitely outside our purview. No doubt the Bahmanis had certain corridors such as those leading to the seaports of Dabul and Chaul, but in all probability they had little to claim besides the roadway, and this is the reason why Goa had to be conquered time and again till it was finally lost to the Portuguese mainly owing to the difficulty of holding the hinterland, and a brave captain like Khalaf Hasan Basri had to lay down his life in the vain attempt to probe through the density of the Konkan jungle in the north.

While the lavaic plateau has an abrupt fall of nearly 4,000 feet on the western fringe, it has a very gentle slope eastwards and takes more than three hundred miles to level itself with the eastern plains bordering on the Bay of Bengal. The plateau is almost level as it leaves the Ghats, but about 75° E, it has a ridge about 50 mile wide, and it is on the slopes of that ridge that we find the historic town of Khuldabad on the edge of the precipice studded with Ellora Caves on its base, Daulatabad in the middle and Aurangabad on the southern edge. Eastward of Aurangabad the slope is too gentle to be perceptible, but it is flanked on the south by a ridge between 2,000 and 2,500 feet above sea level, extending from the Ghats through Ahmadnagar right up to the triune town of Golconda-Hyderabad-Secunderabad, the Jubilee Hills of Hyderabad forming its easternmost boundary. In the intervening expanse we find the ancient town of Bidar living on a high eminence with a sheer drop of about a thousand feet to the south, and it is this which makes the climate of Bidar so salubrious as to have led Ahmad Shah Wali declare it to be the capital of his dominions in preference to the arid and sultry Gulbarga which lies on the other side of the great ridge. No doubt Muhammad I had in his mind the strategic importance of Golconda as the easternmost point of the chain extending from 73° E, eastward when he agreed to make that town the frontier post of the nascent Bahman State, and it was only a matter of time that the masters of the highlands descended to the deltaic plains of the Godavari and the Krishna and annex them to their dominions.

Coming to peninsular India south of the Tungabhadra we find that the geographical character of the land gradually changes till there is little in common with the plateau we have left, so that the epithet, South India which has been coined to indicate the tapering part of the peninsula in contradistinction to Deccan proper seems to be entirely justified. Goa is situated near the point at which the lava-capped northern section of the Western Ghats almost touches their crystalline southern section, and the Ghats now extend to the east in the form of the Mysore plateau with its northern limit touching the Tungabhadra just where the Hampi ruins now take us back to Vijayanagar days. Thus when once this northern spur was conquered at Talikota the victors could march south right through the Karnatak territory with hardly so much as a hitch. The extraordinary historical phenomenon of European traders, Dutch, English, French and the rest, being left to increase their influence south of about 16° N, is due to the apparent lack of interest on the part of the rulers of the plateau in this region owing to the utter lack of real ports south of 16° N. It is noticeable that unlike the deltas of the Godavari and the Krishna, the solitary southern delta, that of the Cauvery, is not protruding forward, and there are no ports worth the name there owing to the unsuitability of the weather caused by two distinct currents, the N. E. trades and the S E monsoons. Madras itself is an artificial harbour and is by no means safe all the year round, and although the precipitate narrowing of the peninsula causes increased rainfall and higher humidity, it cannot compare favourably with the naturally manured soil of lavaic Deccan.

Now we may safely delimit the natural boundaries of Medieval Deccan. Its north-western boundary is somewhere north of Auranabad and touches a huge circle passing by the Tapti in the north and Goa in the south. The line of the natural expansion of the race would be from Golconda to the basin of the Godavari and Krishna in the east and through the gorges of the Western Ghats into the plain of the Konkan in the west. In the south the earliest attempts to control the crystalline section of the Western Ghats beyond the Tungabhadra were a failure in spite of the decided superiority of the inhabitants of the lavaic plateau, which is remarkably evidenced by the famous query of one of the greatest Rayas of Vijayanagar. Still once the northern limits of that section of the peninsula were subdued in 1565, the negotiators could march as far south as the southern limits of the Mysore plateau and implant their colonies in the tracts which they deemed hospitable. Thus the Deccan core may be said to extend from the Ghats in the west to the Golconda coast in the east and from the Tapti in the north to the Tungabhadra in the South with offshoots running to the Arabian Sea and the Mysore plateaus.

Individuality of the Deccan

I regret I have possibly taken a little too long to delineate the natural limits of the Deccan with due regard to the medieval history of this part of India, and I have taken the liberty of doing this as such definition has not been attempted so far. In fact the first time the history of the Deccan was reviewed as such was when the President of our Executive Committee, who is also a creator of the Deccan History Association, made an important contribution to the problem of Deccan History in the excellent and thought-provoking address he delivered from his place as the president of the Deccan history section of the Indian History Congress in December 1941. The acceptance of the principle of having a section of that year's Congress devoted to the Deccan taken as a unit connoted the recognition of the principle that the Deccan has an entity of its own within the larger entity of India, and that its historical evolution is distinct in some ways from the history of the far south almost as much as it is from the history of the northern parts of the country. Nawab Ali Yawar Jung Bahadur's address dealt with the history of the Deccan both as a unit and as a part of the sub-continent of India, and he rightly stressed the truth of the consciousness of its individuality which is so patent in the thought and action of the inhabitants of the apex of the great plateau.

A personal touch may be interesting. As far back as the autumn of 1913, I was attending some advanced courses in Geography delivered by Professor Lyde of the London University. It was just after the removal of the capital of India from Calcutta to Delhi, and the venerable teacher was expounding the theory of political capitals and its application to the history of the world. It now seems all too remarkable that an audience consisting mostly of English students was told that although Delhi and an importance of its own from the viewpoint of history as also in its being the terminus of a number of railway arteries connecting the the north with the rest of India, still the true geographical capital of India lay somewhere near Daulatabad and Aurangabad in the Deccan!

A land of contacts

Those of us who know something of the Deccan are struck by the phenomenal diversity of its population, its languages, its races and its religions. The territory is the home of people speaking not only the major languages of the land, Urdu, Telugu, Marathi and Kannda, but we find the Pauri remnants of the Gujarati allies of the Bahmanis speaking Gujarati, the Sikhs of Nander speaking Panjabi, the colonists of the far south speaking Tamil and the opulent Marwaris of the Deccan speaking Rajasthani. Religions are also diverse, and the proverbial religious tolerance of the rulers of Medieval Deccan is evidenced by the fact that we do not come across any notable convert to Islam till the final stages of Bahmani rule and that even today an overwhelming majority of the people follow the faith of their ancient ancestors without let or hindrance. In fact this table-land has acted as a buffer between the north and south, between the Aryan and the Dravidian, between the followers of numerous Indian sects and between practically all the major languages of India, and it may well be said that had there been no such land of contacts it would have had to be created. Time and again attempts have been made to absorb the Deccan into great Empires but such attempts have failed in the long run and the Deccan has succeeded in retaining its individuality in some form or other.

Deccani Culture

This individuality has bred a peculiar culture of its own which may be termed the Deccani culture and which has its roots deep in the Medieval period. The famous order of Krishna Deva Raya to recruit soldiers among the Mussulmans, the direct influence of Hindu Culture over the great Bahmani successions states, Ahmadnagar, Bijapur and Golconda, the patronage granted by the Adilshahi and the Qutbshahi Sultans, to local languages, the affinity between the system adopted by the great Abyssinian Malik Ambar and the phenomenal rise of the Mahrathas, the closest cooperation between the Deccani states and the rising confederacy centered at Satara, all this may be trite to a deep student of the history of the Deccan, but provides an ample evidence of what was leading to the cementing of a composite culture. It is a truism to say that, trained in the art of warfare developed by Malik Ambar, the Maratha people rose against the advancing Mughal armies to defend the tottering Adilshahis of Bijapur, and it was only when the fall of that state became imminent that they took up arms on their own account "in order to protect the Cows and the Brahmans" as Sivaji put it.

Cultural Actions and Reactions

This interaction of cultures is seen very early and Hindu influence was early creeping even into religious edifices of the Muslims of the Deccan, as is seen in the prayer niche in the tomb of Ghiyasu'd Din Bahmani at Gulbarga. In Firoz Shah's reign this influence becomes patent, and the Sultan took to the study of local languages to the extent that he could converse with those whose mother tongues they were. It was again Firoz who, for the first time ordered that the tomb he built for the reception of his remains after his death should have definite Hindu elements intermingled with purely Persian motifs. On the other hand we find definite Bahmani influences in the architecture of the remains which fill us with respect and wonder at Hampi. The marriage of Parthal with Prince Hasan Khan had set the ball rolling in the way of an inter-racial and inter-religious dovetailing of the people and in Firoz's reign such unions must have become the order of the day. The influence of Hindu culture on the ruling classes of the Deccan became so much the common feature that during the invasion of Vijayanagar by the Bahmani armies about 1400, a Qadi, Siraj by name, could disguise himself as a Hindu without any fear of recognition. This mutual identification of the Hindus and the Muslims in their daily secular life crept even in their dress, and we find little to differentiate between the dress worn by Sivaji from the dress worn by the later Adilshahi Sultans. Naturally these similarities could not fail to create a common vehicle of thought, and it is the Deccan which saw the rapid evolution of that beautiful language, call it Dakhni or Hindui or Rekhtah or Urdu, which I am proud to call my own. If Urdu means the evolved language written in Persian characters we find its earliest prose from the pen of that great saint of the Deccan, Hazrat Khwaja Banda Nawaz of Gulbarga as far back as the beginning of the fifteenth century although the earliest Deccani poetry of which we are aware that of Shah Miranji, goes back only to the end of the sixteenth century Urdu was patronised both by the Adilshahis and the Qutbshahis, and a number of the Sultans of Golconda, like Muhammad Qatub Shah, were poets of note in that language.

The Cradle of Medieval Chronicles.

This brings us to the historians of Medieval Deccan, and without a short account of their importance no summary of that period of our history would be complete. It is significant that the Deccan is the part of India where one of the most important—if not ~~the~~ most important—chronicle of Medieval India, Muhammad Qasim Ferishta's famous history, the Gulshan-i-Ibrahimi, was penned, while another great work which preceded the Ferishta, i.e., the Burhan-i-Ma'asir, was also written down in the Deccan. Ferishta has drawn freely from a number of chronicles, compiled both in poetry and in prose, one of the most important being Mulla Dawud Bid'i's Tuhfatu's-Salat. Then we have the letters of the great Bahmani wazir, Mahmud Gawan, the Riyadu'l-Insha which throw a large mass of contemporary events in great relief. Lastly we have Shah Nawaz Khan's Ma'asiru'l-Umara, a great dictionary of the biography of noble personages, which was also compiled in the Deccan. Of the chronicles relating to the Bahmani succession states the chief are Basatinu's-Salat and Tazkirat-ul-Muluk relating to the history of Bijapur and the Tarikh-i Qutb Shahi which deals with Golconda, while Burhan-i-Ma'asir deals with the royal house of Ahmadnagar and Ferishta with the Sultans of Bijapur at some length. As we come down to the Mughal period of Deccan history the demarcating line between the north and the south is virtually effaced till the supineness of the north led to the autonomy of Asaf Jah I in 1724. Right through the later Medieval epoch, beginning about the middle of the seventeenth century we have the great Maratha sources, the Bhakkars, and the whole mass of documents collectively known as the Peshwa Daftar which form a necessary complement to the chronicle in the Persian language, and it is absolutely necessary to correlate these documents with our chronicles if we would have an objective picture of the period just before the rise of the Asafjahi Dynasty.

Study of Deccan History

I am afraid I have to pass on to a sad tale, the comparative neglect of the study of Medieval Deccan history by modern scholarship. At the outset mention must be made of the yeoman service to the history of Marathas by that trio of Poona scholars, ~~Rajwade, Sardesai and Potdar.~~ Rajwade has become a classical name, and his erstwhile colleague, Sardesai, is happily as full of energy today with fourscore years to his credit as he was half a century ago. Potdar, on his part, leads a brilliant band of scholars and an extremely prolific research centre housed in the modest buildings of the Bhaiata Itihasa Samshodhak Mandal at Poona. Looking further east and south we are all very glad that the Madras University is doing all it can to make the glories of Vijayanagar shine again by the researches they are undertaking today and the Andhra Research Society of Rajahmundry is doing very useful work on Eastern Deccan. Coming nearer home we have the almost ancient Archaeological Society appearing in the newly made garb of the Archaeological and Historical Society, but may I say in all humility that this outer form has not made the old lady much more youthful or active in essence in spite of the efforts of all concerned. On the other hand the Archaeological Department of H. E. H. the Nizam's Government has proved of a very great utility in unearthing and conserving a large mass of historical material during its existence. I would, however, take leave to suggest that the Department should pay a little more attention to Medieval monuments according to a certain plan. Hardly any other tract of India is richer in Medieval historical monuments than the Deccan, and may I suggest that the Department should take up the exploration of definite parts of the Dominions of H. E. H. the Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar and complement its findings to the work that has been done in adjacent British India provinces, if only for the reason that the archaeological and historical demarcation between the two is at times practically non-existent. If the Department attempts that it would do a great service to historical scholarship in the country.

My esteemed friend, Dr. S. N. Sen, Director of Indian Archives and President of the seventh session of the Indian History Congress, said in his Presidential Address last December that the history of any country is based on two foundations, Archaeology and Archives. The mass of documents contained in our Daftar-i Diwani wa Mal can be equalled only by the archives of Poona and Madras in their utility for an objective study of the later Medieval period of our history. We are all glad that a new vista of historical research has been opened up by the appointment of a permanent Advisory Board under a Royal Farman-i-Mubarak of His Exalted Highness the Nizam, and this Board has on hand a number of schemes which will go a long way to assist those engaged in research on the Medieval history of the Deccan.

I would not take much of your time in recounting work on Medieval Deccan history by individuals in recent times, as very little of it exists. As a matter of fact besides the history of Golconda by my friend and colleague, Mr. Abdul Majid Siddiqi, and the lives of Muhammad Qutb Shah and Mir Mu'min by another esteemed friend, the founder of Idara-i Adabiyat-i Urdu, very little has been done on the later middle Ages. Hakım Shamsu'llah Qadı Sahib's Salatin-ı Ma'bar falls just outside the limits of the Deccan, while the Moulvi 'Abdu'l-Jabbar Khan's Tazkira-ı Salatin-ı Dakan is at best an uncritical compendium of books he says he had at hand. I may be permitted to tell the members of the Conference that my own book the Chronology and Culture of the Bahmanis is now complete and I hope that it will be in the hands of those interested in the subject of Medieval Deccan soon. As I said from my place as the President of the Medieval section of the Indian History Congress in December 1943, the Osmania University are doing all that is possible to encourage research in the history of Medieval Deccan, and some of the theses written by our scholars have already been published. As is known, the Hyderabad Government are sponsoring a large history of the Deccan, the second volume of which will deal with the Medieval period, I hope this volume will soon be taken up and will thus fill the lacuna which exists between the ancient period of Deccan history and its modern or the Asaf Jahi period.

I am afraid this is all that is being done at present. What is needed, however, is a much larger output of work on the history of the Bahmanis and each of the Succession States written from a purely objective point of view with as few of prejudged notions and subjective elements as possible. I appeal to you, ladies and gentlemen, to do what you can to make the Medieval period—which is truly the formative period of our own time—a living period by devoting your time and attention to it.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I have done. I thank you for the kindness and indulgence with which you have listened to me and hope that the deliberations of this section would further bring home to you importance of all that Medieval Deccan stands for.

DURING the first years of its life the English settlement at Madras saw the rapid rise to dominance of Nawab Mir Jumla in the Carnatic. Sriranga Raya's (acc. 1642) grant of the site and other privileges of Madras to the English, confirming the previous grants of his subordinates, was dated October November 1646. Damarla Venkatappa, had been dismissed from his position of authority at the capital, by Sriranga Raya, and he now created trouble by intriguing with Golconda general and was put under arrest on suspicion of treachery. Ayyappa, the younger Damarla brother, brought pressure to bear on the Raya and endeavoured hard to secure his release (1643-44). The Dutch records of that year mention the occupation of Venkatagiri by the Golconda troops and also the release and reinstatement of Damarla Venkatapathi in his previous position. Now, Sriranga sought the assistance of the Bijapur generals operating in the Carnatic Balaghat, by promising to give them 15 lakhs of pagodas and 24 elephants, while the English at Madras made their first move to get from the Raya a confirmation of their charters previously got from the Damarla brothers. The position was that Sriranga had got an initial success against Golconda, got round the elder Damarla and was feeling secure for the time being¹. The place of the Damarla chief was now taken by Mallai Chinna Chetty, whom the Dutch assisted with troops and guns subduing the forts still in possession of the younger Damarla brother who was hostile to them. Mallai bid fair to become the master of the whole coast*tract, aimed at the overlordship of Madras and demanded half the profits accruing from its customs, in the place of the Damarla Nayak. The English naturally resisted Mallai's proceedings

"This country being all in broils the old king of Karnatic being dead, so is the Nayak of Armagon, whose country is all in the hands of the Moors, and who will ere long by all likelihood be masters of all this country, for our Nayak, not finding the respect from the new king as he expected, did make proffer to assist the Moors, but ere he could bring his treason about, 'twas discovered he (was) apprehended by the king, who hath seized a great part of his country, but we believe he will be forced suddenly to restore it again and release him, for our Nayak's brother and kinsmen are levying an army for his rescue, (who are within half a day's journey of each other), will force his liberty or ruin the whole kingdom."

In 1644, Golconda proceeded to press steadily along the coast southwards, and though pushed back a little, was still threatening the country round Fort St. George.² Within a short time, Madras was able to write to Surat that Mallai and the Dutch had quarrelled and the Raya was helping the former against the latter who were besieged in Pulicat with a considerable force. The English now fished in these troubled waters, wanted to ruin entirely the trade of their rivals and endeavoured to get from the Raya a confirmation of all their privileges. Thus came about the embassy of Greenhill to the Raya.³

The operations round Pulicat by the Dutch had begun about the middle of the previous August and in January 1646 the English at Madras wrote that the general of the King of Golconda Mir Jumla had advanced with a great army and was opposed by Mallai, with a body of 3,000 men whom he had withdrawn from the operations going on round Pulicat. But when Sriranga Raya was defeated by his own rebellious Nayaks in December 1645, Mir Jumla was able to take possession of Udayagiri from Mallai who surrendered it, as the English report said, "upon composition for himself and all his people to go away free". Now the forces of Bijapur and Golconda joined together and laid siege to Raya Vellore itself and defeated the Raya under its walls. This meant that the operations against the Dutch at Pulicat ceased with the fall of Mallai from power. Mir Jumla now overrun all the land and easily became the overlord of Pulicat and San Thome (before October 1647) when the English factors reported that he had assumed the title of Nawab and had begun to rule the country in his own name. The English had to give him a brass gun, which he would not be denied of, 'whether he had lent us this money or no, otherwise he would not have confirmed our old privileges formerly granted us by the now fled Jentue King'. Mir Jumla, after thus securing the allegiance of the English in Madras, passed on to the siege of Gingee. New English Agent, of Madras (i.e., had to lend the Nawab Mir Jumla his gunner and several of his best soldiers for the blockade of San

2 Letter of Madras to the Company, dated 8th September 1644

"The Moors but five weeks past had advanced with their arms within three miles of Pulicat and sent unto the Dutch Governor to surrender up their castle, and we did suddenly expect the same, but shortly after the Jentues (Raya's troops) came down with a great power, gave the Moors battle, routed their army and put the moors to flight beyond Armagon, where they are now gathering a head again, so the danger that we live in is yet unknown."

The King of Bussanagere letter to the Agent in Madraspatam, dated Arfour (Vellore?) the 25th September 1645—letter from the Madras Factors to Surat after the embassy had returned, dated 21st January 1646.

Thome The English thus incurred the enmity of the Portuguese at the latter place, and though a peace was soon patched up, mutual friction continued

Mir Jumla's campaign against Gingee was made in conjunction with the forces of Bijapur. He allowed his Bijapur ally to take possession of Gingee and Tegnapatam (later Fort St David) on the coast, and Sriranga fled to Mysore for protection. Thus Mir Jumla's authority over the coast country round Madras became fully consolidated. He had in his service a number of European gunners and cannon-founders and well appreciated the advantages of European help. He was a person of great talents, marked by "industry, rapid despatch of business, administrative capacity, military genius and inborn power of leadership." From the first, during his campaigns in the Carnatic, he strengthened himself by securing a number of European gunners and cannon-founders and maintaining his army at a high pitch of discipline. From Cumbum he extended the dominion of Golconda, i.e., his own powers, to Gandikota, Chandragiri and Tirupati. His dominions in the Carnatic covered an area of 300 miles long and 50 miles broad. He maintained an army of 50,000 well-mounted cavalry of his own, besides 4,000 horses of his Sultan's. His infantry troops numbered 20,000, and he had an excellent park of artillery and a large number of trained elephants.

Mir Jumla confirmed all the privileges that the English had obtained from the previous Hindu rulers when they gave him help against San Thome. Thus the years 1646-47 saw the English at Madras continue to secure, first the Raya's confirmation of their privileges and next the friendship of the Mussalman conqueror and a further confirmation of their rights.

II

Greenhill was Agent of Madras, for the first time from 1648 to 1652 and later from 1655 to 1659. He carried no negotiations successfully with Muhammadans. His very first letter to the Company mentions the confirmation by Mir Jumla of the privileges of the English in Madras. From it we learn that Madras was comparatively safe under the rule of Golconda, whereas the Mussalmans of Bijapur who were in possession of the country lower down the coast in the Gingee dominion, had let loose a body of 8,000 freebooters, whose "incursions robberies and devastations bath brought a desolation on a great part of the country round about, especially the three prime cloth-ports, Devanampatnam (later Fort St David), Porto Novo and Pullacheri (Pondichery) of which the last two are in a manner ruined, the other hardly preserving itself in a poor condition with a continual presence."

Greenhill contrived to be on friendly terms with Mir Jumla who even made a proposal that he would gladly subscribe to the stock of the Company and to share in its profits. The English sent their native agent, the Brahman Venkatapathi,⁴ to accompany Littleton who went on an embassy to the Nawab, who was then encamped at Gandikotta. Greenhill wrote that the Nawab had, in his own right, 4,000 horses, 300 elephants, about 500 camels and 10,000 oxen and was much in favour with the Great Mughal himself. He owned ten vessels and had extensive trade relations with Pegu, Arakan, Persia, Bengal, Mocha, Peiak, the Maldives and even Macassar. He had conquered from the Raya dominions yielding 40 lakhs of pagodas per annum. The Nawab had already assisted the Company with a loan and now offered a much larger loan of 50 to 60 thousand pagodas, and therefore, was deemed to entertain a real affection for the English.⁵

Greenhill's second term of administration which lasted four years was marked by the unfortunate reduction of Fort St. George to the rank of a subordinate agency. It was during these years that Nawab Mir Jumla joined Prince Aurangzeb, the Mughal Viceroy of the Deccan, and cleverly ingratiated himself into the favour of the Emperor Shah Jahan, thus protecting himself against the anger of the Sultan of Golconda, whose displeasure he had incurred. He went away from the Carnatic to the Mughal Court, leaving the administration of his dominion of the Poonamallee country in the hands of tyrannous lieutenants like Bala Rao. Mir Jumla got from the Mughal Emperor a confirmation of his possession of the Carnatic country that he had secured by his arms and continued his trade activities in this region right upto July 1656. His former master, Abdulla Kutb Shah, had indeed tried to win back the friendship of his overgrown ministers, but the latter definitely went over to the Mughal side when his family was imprisoned by the Sultan in Golconda on account of the haughty behaviour of his son. When the Kutb Shah tried to establish his own authority over Mir Jumla's acquisition in the Carnatic, Shah Jahan decided that they should be deemed as Mir Jumla's personal jaghir and as held directly from the Mughal Emperor and curtly ordered the recall of all Golconda officers from that province.

Taking advantage of this situation, Sriranga Raya tried to recover possession of this region, and his father-in-law even made 4 Venkata's son Viraraghava Brahmany rose to considerable importance in the next generation as the English agent at the Golconda court.

5 We learn from Mr J.N. Sarkar (vide the J.B.R.S. Vol. XXX Part I, pp. 84 et seq.) that the term Mir Jumla was the designation of the holder of a post and not a personal name. Mir Jumla (Amir-i-Jumla) implies 'the chief of collections' and strictly his office was that of a finance minister, but extended to the command of expedition and the police functions of keeping law and order in the state. The famous Mir Jumla was appointed to his post in March 1634.

a raid on Periyapalayam in the neighbourhood of Madras. Koneri Chetty had contrived to enter the service of the Ray and become his general, and soon the country round about Poonamallee was brought, for the time being, back under Hindu rule, but Koneri Chetty quickly betrayed his new master and made overtures to Tupaki Krishnappa of Gingee who was the lieutenant of Mir Jumla and who contrived to inflict a defeat upon Sriranga in September 1657. This brought about the siege of Madras on behalf of Mir Jumla, the first of its kind.

III

Mir Jumla had left the Carnatic country in charge of an agent of his, who tried to practise oppressions towards the English. He had his headquarters at Poonallee. Troubles arose on a serious scale when Greenhill seized a junk belonging to the Nawab when it was riding off San Thome, in retaliation for the action of the Nawab's agent in stopping grain and goods from coming as usual into Madras, in raising the sunkam dues and in not allowing the English to buy any rice or paddy at all in the country besides subjecting them to many other indignities for which they could obtain no redress.

The English also helped, in some little measure, the practically dispossessed Sriranga Raya in his desperate attempts to regain possession of some part of his former kingdom, and they gave some help to Koneri Chetty who had now taken service under the Raya and was at the head of his partisans and soldiers. Madras itself was frequently subjected to threats of actual attack by Mir Jumla's troops and by the Raya's partisans, the rival parties in the struggle. Koneri Chetty was, on one occasion, beaten by the Muhammadan troops, and he fled to Fort St George for protection, being followed close at his heels by the victors, who entered the Indian town, burnt some thatched houses and plundered others. Thereupon, a large number of the Indian inhabitants abandoned the settlement. Koneri Chetty's soldiers had sought protection in the Fort itself and the Nawab's men who dared not direct an attack on it had to retreat with a loss of thirty in an engagement "about a mile off on the further side of the river by the toddy trees of Vepery" (January 1657).

Nor was Madras to suffer alone in this miserable position. The Dutch at Pulicat were not altogether secure in spite of their strength. The Raya's troops were able to maintain parity, for some months, with the Nawab's men. Koneri Chetty finally gave himself up into the hands of the Muhammadans. This treacherous act of his rendered him liable to the suspicion of having purposely betrayed his master, and of having been suborned to do so by Tupakī Krishnappa Nayak of Gingee, who acted as the general of Mir Jumla's troops. The English Agent feared that Koneri Chetty might have even planned to surrender Fort St. George into the hands of the enemy, if he should have been admitted into it with his men, as he very importunately insisted⁶

Thus the attack on Madras in 1656-57 formed the first formidable danger that threatened the settlement. It gave an incentive to the development of the fortifications. It resulted in the completion of the wall enclosing the Outer Fort & the walled Inner Citadel and the European quarter around it, both of which constituted the White Town. Soon after this a revolution took place in the fortunes of Mir Jumla, as his master, Prince Aurangzeb, now triumphed in the civil war of succession. Mir Jumla became the viceroy of Bengal on the accession of Aurangzeb, and thus his interest in his Carnatic dominion ceased. The Golconda Sultan was quietly able to resume sway over the neighbourhood of Madras (1658)

Mir Jumla gave trouble to the English and a narrative was prepared by Chamber entitled "A Relation of several passages since the Founding of the Town of Madrassapatam". It was drawn up before 1662 and is valuable as furnishing an account of the siege of Madras in Greenhill's time⁷

IV

We find from the Council's Minute of November 28, 1661, that the privileges enjoyed by Madras at the time were not anything more than what had been secured at the first building of the

The following passage from the Report would throw light on the dispute and its sequel 'Afterward Sidelee (Sayyid Ali) sent us word that the Nabob had conferred all the affairs of these partes upon Tupake Krishnappa, wherefor would that we should write noe more to him, he having written many Lying Storeys to Tupake Krishnappa whereby we were besieged eight moneths. fort and town " which is that you have such a circuit belonging to the town of Madraspatani, and the inhabitants to be counted as your subjects, and the justice to be executed by you, only one half of the customs to be paid to the Diwan, which is meant the King Viceroy or chief Governor of the country "

Bala Rao, the governor for the Muasalmans of the neighbouring country, caused a great amount of injury to the settlement. His agent who was empowered to collect the Nawab's share of the customs, encouraged factions among the officials of the Indian town, like those referred to above, hindered the Company's Merchants in their work of providing cloth for export and forced the townsmen to buy paddy at 25% above the bazaar price, stopping all other paddy, except his own, coming into the town and "demanding customs that was never heard of before."

Mir Sayyid Ali was appointed to be in charge of the Poona-mallee country in succession to Bala Rao, and the English hoped to get some relief from him. They had taken possession of one of the Nawab's junks and were now asked to give it back. For as long a period as eight months was Madras subjected to blockade by Tupaki Krishnappa Nayak and Bala Rao under the orders of Sayyid Ali, and at the last the troubles ceased, but only for the time being, when in 1658, Agent Greenhill and Krishnappa Nayak made an agreement that Madras should pay the Nawab's Diwan annually 380 pagodas for the Nawab's dues of half the customs of the town.

In 1659 the Golconda troops left the neighbourhood of Madras as soon as they thought that the Hindu rising had been effectively suppressed. Two years later, they again appeared in the neighbourhood, because Shahji, the Bijapur governor of the Mysore country and the Lower Carnatic coast, had then attacked and taken possession of Porto Novo, and they now intended to attack San Thome, lest it should fall into the hands of the designing Dutch. The Golconda general, Raza Kuli afterwards known as Nawab Neknam Khan, laid siege to San Thome early in 1662 and starved it into surrender in May of that year. Many of rich merchants of the Portuguese colony thereupon migrated to Madras and crowded the settlement. The English Fort itself was much threatened, and Chamber wrote that they would defend themselves by sea rather than lose their trade and privileges.

In 1663 the English got into trouble with Nawab Neknam Khan (called also General Riza Kuli)⁸ over the dues from Madras.

⁸ He was a servant of Shah Abbas of Persia and came over to Golconda where he was entertained by Abdulla Kuli Shah.

Naturally, the Nawab's demands were pitched very high, and he threatened to blockade Madras with an army of 40,000 men quartered in its neighbourhood. He demanded that a Muhammadan captain should be admitted into the town and be permitted to erect a warehouse for facilitating the collection of customs by his officers. Winter enlarged the Inner Citadel in the Fort, strengthened the garrison and provided for the forming of a chapel within the Castle wherein public service might be regularly held.

Nawab Neknam Khan continued to have differences with the Madras administration and claimed that he had the right to receive not only half the customs, but the whole of the proceeds and that he would appoint an havildar in Madras to check the receipts. The Nawab long persisted in his demands, Foxcroft steadily resisted them, and the relations between them became strained. The Nawab, who is described by Martin, as then being the chief minister of Golconda, added to the San Thome fortifications as a measure of further coercion. In 1670 Neknam Khan's deputy imposed a strict blockade on Madras which lasted for a month. About the beginning of 1672 Nawab Neknam Khan died. Troubles arose with the French capture of San Thome, and these brought on Madras a great change.

The French occupation of San Thome began or rather interjected itself into Madras relations with Golconda. The foundation of Madras was laid at a period of declining prosperity for San Thome. It was subjected to the buffetings of enemies, threatened by the Dutch and attacked by Golconda; and at last it fell into hands of the latter power in May 1662. It remained under Mussalman control till 1672, when it was taken possession of by the French who were able to hold it only for a time. The French occupation resulted, however, in a considerable extension of the fortifications of the place, particularly on the western or land side, where it was in danger of attack from the Mussalmans.

The French occupation of San Thome lasted only but two years which constituted, in reality, one prolonged period of blockade and attack of the town by the combined armies of the Sultan of Golconda and of the Dutch. It was finally starved into surrender in August 1674 after the siege had lasted nearly two years. The French had to stand two sieges. In the first siege they fortified the Sri Kapaliwarar Temple of Mylapore (adjacent to San Thome on the west) as their western outpost and also the Triplicane Temple to the north and forced his besiegers to retire. The second siege was, however, more formidable. The Dutch had the honour of reducing the Fort, but the Muhamadans actually took possession of it. The English Governor, Langhorne, made a strong representation to the Muhamadans of Golconda that the fortifications of San Thome should be completely demolished, particularly as he was afraid that the French might recover the Fort by paying a consideration to the Sultan or by a sudden attack. One consequence of the French surrender of San Thome was the withdrawal of Martin, one of the French captains, with a small body of Frenchmen, to Pondichery lower down the coast, where he founded the famous French settlement. The site of Pondicherry had already been granted to the French by the Bijapur Sultan to whom it belonged and now Martin began to plan its fortification.

Governor Langhorne (1672-78) was afraid that if the fortifications of San Thome were not immediately pulled down, the French would come and take it again and that if the king of Golconda should allow the Dutch keep the place, they might be obliged to restore it to the French by any agreement that they might enter into. The best thing, in the view of the English Governor, was for the Dutch to lend engineers and other artificers to the Sultan of Golconda and to help in blowing up the walls with gun powder. In fact, in December 1674, the Musslim governor of the place proposed to restore it to the French in return for a consideration of a lakh of pagodas. But the Dutch had gained over Madanna Pant, the then all-powerful Brahman minister of Golconda, and nipped the scheme in the bud. Governor Langhorne was very suspicious of the French designs and was warmly supported by the Dutch in his insistence that the Golconda authorities should demolish the fortifications. At first, orders were issued from Golconda for the destruction both of the fortifications and also of the principal churches and other buildings of the place. But the Muslim governor of the town protested against the demolition of the buildings and therefore contrived to save them from the pick-axe. The fortifications were pulled down with the assistance of the Dutch and the English who supplied engineers and overseers and also new gun-powder (1675), but the English Governor desisted from taking an open and active part in the work of destruction, for fear of embroiling the English Company with the French and the Portuguese, both of whom had put forth their claims to the town with great persistence. The dismantled town of San Thome was quickly re-occupied by a number of Portuguese settlers who wanted to rebuild the walls, and hence in 1697 the town was totally dismantled. It finally came under British occupation in 1749.

The most important event in Governor Langhorne's rule was the acquisition of a cowle⁹, confirmed by his seal, early in 1672 from Nawab Neknam Khan for Madras. The cowlé promised that the town of Madras "shall remain wholly rented for ever under the English so long that the Sun and the Moon endureth and so they shall perpetually enjoy it", it also empowered the English to get the command, government and justice of the said town. In this cowlé Madraspatnam and Chennapatnam are detailed in their exact area, the former as covering the limits of the pre-British town or village of that name and perhaps including the whole of the land originally granted by the Damarla brothers, and the latter, Chennapatnam, being the specific name given to the new Fort and town which the English erected within those limits, but south of the original village. We learn that Narimedu (i.e. Jaçkal Mound) was the ground adjacent to Chennapatnam on the west side, having been acquired in Raja Sriranga Raya's grant of 1645. The annual payment of 1,200 pagodas was known as the Town Rent. It was paid regularly till about 1750 when it was remitted by Nawab Muhammad Ali.

The village of Triplicane which was the seat of an ancient Vishnu Shrine dating back to Pallava times, was not included in any of the grants upto-date. It was handed over to the English only a little later by Musa Khan, the successor of Nawab Neknam Khan, as the agent of the Sultan of Golconda. The English now got the village for an annual rental of fifty pagodas, though they had been in occupation of the place perhaps from about 1658, the particular date being unascertained.

In the second siege of San Thome, the Dutch made Triplicane the base of their operations while the French claimed several villages round about Madras, like Kodambakam, Egmore, Triplicane, Chepauk, Pudupakam and Membalam, all being claimed as having been formerly dependent on San Thome. The English urged that the French claims should be opposed and maintained that Triplicane had been in their hands, while the village of Egmore was held by their own chief merchant Kasi Viranna, alias, Hasan Khan. It was only in 1676, that the Sultan of Golconda issued a *farman*¹⁰ confirming the cowlé of 1672 of Nawab Neknam Khan and specifically recognising the English claim to Triplicane.

VI

In 1677, the governor (Langhorne) got a letter from Nawab Muhammad Ibrahim Khan on behalf of the Golconda Sultan, confirming the English privileges already granted and adding the right to build ships any-where on the sea coast. Gradually Golconda's authority began to weaken, and Poddili Lingappa, who became the local faujdar, acted very much as he liked.

¹⁰ A farman from His Highness the Ollumpara, dated 23rd February 1676.

Governor Master had applied for the grant of additional territory to the Sultan when the latter contemplated a visit to Masulipatam in 1678. The grant of the concessions desired by Master (vide P.C Vol. II 3rd June 1678) could not be secured, but Madanan intimated to the Madras agent at Golconda that if he should receive a present of 3,000 pagodas he would then talk concerning the renting of Santhome, and Egmore and obtain the King's leave to let the same at farm. The sum was paid, negotiations were started, but they fell through and the Madras limits remained the same as before. During the progress of the negotiations Lingappa stopped the import of grain into Madras, and later prohibited all paddy coming into the settlement except through Poonamallee and had to be answered with a punitive expedition.

Podili Lingappa, the Nawab's governor of the coast country, proved a very troublesome man. He resided at Conjeevaram and governed the Poonamallee district through kinsman of his. Lingappa had been intriguing with Kasi Viranna that he would be prepared, in consideration of a loan to be given to him, to further the affairs of the English of Madras at the Sultan's court. Master was at first indifferent to this offer and declared that the English recognised no other authority than that of the Sultan himself and that of his immediate representative, Nawab Ibrahim Khan. Lingappa was very crafty and even intrigued with the English wakil, Viraraghavayya, the son of Venkatapathi, the Brahman, and who had succeeded to his father's office in 1675. The wakil was dismissed by Master for showing undue friendliness with Lingappa, but afterwards restored. Lingappa wanted to withdraw all the coiners and shroffs from Madras and endeavoured to stop the coining of pagodas in the mint at the Fort. In 1682, he was exalted in his official rank¹¹ and entrusted with all the authority over the country that Nawab Nekkam Khan had previously governed. Kasi Viranna had died in 1680, and Lingappa now freed from his intercessions, naturally tried to raise his demands on the English.

Gyfford endeavoured to make peace with Lingappa and to get a new cowle from the Sultan of Golconda. Lingappa demanded a very high payment for himself and gave his protection to the interlopers. He received the very large amount of 7,000 pagodas, on condition that the interlopers should no longer be protected by him.

11 'Our Brameny Egyb Viraraghaviah', writing in May from Golconda, announced that, 'Brameny Accana' ordered Bramine Lyngapa to take upon him the Government from Kiswa river as far as all the Carnatic country as Nabob Yecknam Cawn had formerly, and made him the Chief person of all those countreys. Wherefor it is very necessary to keepe a fitt person of the Company to be by Podula Lyngapa. The succession of Nawabs of the Carnatic after Nekkam Khan appears to have been, Musa Khan 1672, Number Khan 1673, 'Muskuma' 1675, Muhammad Ibrahim 1677, Poddala Lingappa 1682. (The Agent's letter to Fort St. George, dated 17th May 1682.)

and that he should secure a new cowle from Golconda which continued the rent of Madras at 1,200 pagodas per annum

President Yale had plenty of trouble with the Mughals who swallowed up Bijapur and Golconda and consequently became masters of their acquisitions in South India. Towards the end of 1687 Mughal authority was firmly established over the districts of Chingleput, Poonamallee and Conjeevaram. In October 1687, news reached Fort St. George that Golconda had fallen into the hands of Aurangzeb after a protracted siege, and a few days later, the forces of the Mughals had appeared at Conjeevaram and taken possession of Poonamallee and Fath Khan was appointed Subadar of the country and the governor of Chingleput. In November, news was received that Muhammad Ibrahim now called Mahabat Khan was incharge of Golconda and that the Brahmins, Sanganna, Narappa and Madananda Pantulu were confirmed in their former government of Conjeevaram.

A Note on the Cultural Background of Political Struggles in Mediaeval Deccan

BY

PROF S R SHARMA, MA FERGUSON COLLEGE, POONA

INDIAN History is being re-made as well as re-written—re-made in the sense of reconstructing our national life, and re-written literally along modern lines. The latter is an important aspect of the former which is a complex process. Since life is continuous, it must grow out of historical roots. Whatever be the ramification of the branches they must continue to be fed with the ancient sap. Our culture is that sap—it is the very very life-blood which has shaped our destiny. It is in this vital sense that I propose to deal with the cultural background of our political life at one important stage in our history. Though the value of cultural history is increasingly appreciated it is yet to find recognition as a vital element in the making of our history. In the present stage of Indian Historiography a chapter of a summary character, descriptive of literature and art, is deemed sufficient to make good the deficiencies of old style histories. If I might indulge in a bit of orthodox analogy. Culture follows in such history books, like the old-fashioned Indian wife, even where she is not muffled in a Burqa, still detached from the husband and at a respectful distance behind him. But it is not to be ignored that behind the veil of social convention they share a common life and if anything, the better half—not infrequently the dominating partner. In other words, it is culture that shapes political activity with its military concomitants. Kings, courts and battles are the outer manifestations of a people's cultural life—which is their real life.

In the compass of this short paper I shall illustrate the thesis with a few glimpses of Deccan history in mediaeval times.

By the Deccan I mean here the central part of India, enclosed between the two seas with the Narmada and the Mahanadi in the North and the Krishna in the South. This table-land (geologically the oldest and stablest part of our country), with its marginal coastal fringes, has played a part in our cultural history also unequalled by any other part of India. By mediaeval I mean, from the death of Harsha to the death of Aurangzeb. This millennium might appear to you to be too wide a span for my specific concrete treatment, but I shall pick out from it only a few typical facts.

The first outstanding fact is the defence of the Deccan by Pulakesi II against the northern incursion by Harsha. It was a vindication of the strong individuality of the Deccan which is itself the composite product of several forces in history. Ethnically it was not either purely or largely Dravidian like the South or Aryan like the North. It was a synthesis of the more robust elements in both which had survived the impact of the Aryan and the Dravidian in the Deccan. Even the Scythian and other central Asiatic elements had flowed into this matrix to form an adamantine amalgam, and if the exotic origin of some of the Konkan people (like the Chitpavans and Navayats) is to be admitted, many more elements have found their place in this composition. The bedrock of the aboriginal natives like the Kolis and Bedars (wrongly called Berads) has not played an inconspicuous role. In the time of Pulakesi the amalgam, as we now see it, may not have been completed, but its main character had been determined. It was to become stronger as centuries rolled on and other invaders came. Whatever the local variations in the different parts of the Deccan, the Deccanee, in the composite and comprehensive sense, has shown certain 'national' traits of an unmistakeable character through out his history. Among these his toughness of fibre and spirit of independence are not the least. Though these physical and moral qualities have made him somewhat too individualistic, and defiantly rebellious at times, they have also made for his keen sense of self-respect and robust patriotism. These were the qualities which evoked the admiration of the Chinese Huen Tsiang.

There was nothing radically different between the eclectic faith of Harsha and the tolerant Hinduism of Pulakesi and their subjects—culturally speaking. But geography, language and local traditions had marked out the Deccan as a cultural bloc to stand up for its separate independent existence, apart from the Trans-Vindhyan as well as the southern Dravidian. To this bloc belonged the Chalukya, Rashtrakuta, and Yadava kingdoms before the later crystallisation. Maratha, Kannada and Telugu peoples arose. Prior to the emergence of these latter provincial patriotisms—standing apart from the Northern Hindusthani as well as the southern Tamilian. The false values attached to Dynastic heroes, by historians totally ignoring the people and their culture, have been the source of preposterous claims in terms of modern provincial distinctions. Where the people were as yet undifferentiated and the rulers made no differentiation on the ground of sections of their subjects being either Marathas, Andhras or Kannadigas, it is both unhistorical and ridiculous for modern historians to speak of a Maratha Empire or Karnatak Empire or Telugu Empire, during the early Mediaeval period. The accident of the founder (often mythical ancestor) of a ruling family having come from an Andhra or Karnatak village (not fully identified) is made the basis of the ancient glories of Andhra or Karnatak. The rulers themselves, it is admitted, never tried to impose any sectionalised culture upon their subjects, their civil and military officers as well as personnel were drawn from all classes of their people, and they patronised the arts and literature and even worship according to dissenting creeds like the Jaina. Under these circumstances it is misleading, if not wrong, to speak in terms of modern distinctions. It is proper to speak of a Telugu, Kannada, or Tulu Empire. Huen Tsiang's description, it is interesting to note, has been appropriated by the Kannadigas as well as Marathas—as if it applied to themselves exclusively in the modern provincial sense. One wonders what use provincial historians would have made of it, if the Chinese pilgrim had blamed instead of praising the Chalukyans. The point I wish to emphasise is that, during the earlier or Hindu period of Mediaeval Deccan history, there was a cultural homogeneity in the Deccan which is not to be forgotten or ignored. Its literary, artistic, architectural and other cultural heritage is the common legacy of the Deccan to India. In Ellora we have an object lesson in the juxtaposition of the Buddhist, Jaina and Brahmanical excavations. There is neither Maratha, Kannada nor Andhra there—all is Deccanee. We have in both moments something to be proud of as in the other relics of Ajanta, Amraoti, Nasik, Etc.

But there was another and a weaker side in our mediaeval Deccan culture. That was in the sectarianism and sacerdotalism which were rampant on the eve of the Muslim conquest. During the creative period of the Hindu culture the Deccan was strong and politically independent. The Deccan that withstood Harsha might have also defended itself against Alaaddin Khilji. There was nothing inherently wrong in Hindu culture that made the Deccan vulnerable in the face of Islam. Its resurgence under Vijayanagar and the Marathas demonstrated its potential vigour. What rendered the Deccan indifensible under the last of the Yadavas was the state and character of its culture then. There were Kings, ministers, generals and armies just as they were under the Chalukyas and the Rashtrakutas. But the cultural perversions which described in my 'Maratha History' (just published) deprived the state of its vitality to resist. Hindu Deccan had to pay for this dearly by generations of suffering and misery. Without a strong cultural revival galvanised by continuous suffering there could be no political revival. In short, the way to Raigad lay through Pandharpur. Maratha Svaraj was the outer shell created by Maharashtra-Dharma for its own preservation. The cultural movement was the cause, and the political organisation its effect. Once it was born, it tried to maintain the integrity of the Deccan. 'Deccan for the Deccanees' was Shivaji's rallying cry.

To turn to the Muslim side of the situation the newly founded Bahmani Kingdom as well demonstrated the effects of the Deccanee tradition. Like the Hindu Pulakesi and Shivaji, the Sultans of the Deccan held out for the independence of the Deccan against the imperialist aggressor of the North. It was not merely a war against political aggression, but also a fight for existence on the part of the Deccanee Muslim community which had come into existence under conditions different from those of Northern India. This is too large a theme to be elaborated here, and I must summarily indicate it by a few allusions. Society and culture even among the Muslims of the Deccan were not identical with those of the North. Apart from their Shia creed, they were marked by several other distinctions.⁵ The supply of original Muslims being less perennial, those who came to stay in the Deccan permanently were isolated from the outer Muslim world. Hence they became more dependent upon and were more largely influenced by local conditions and people. They evolved a modus vivendi which soon differentiated them from foreign Muslims. The faction fights between the foreign Muslims and the Deccanee Muslims which darken the pages of their history and undermine the Deccanee Muslim Kingdoms ultimately, were not merely political phenomena. The fight against the Mughals without and the fight against the foreigners within were but facts of the same Kulhr-Campf. Deccanee Muslim culture has given us Deccanee architecture as well as solid contributions to Urdu literature.

The assistance that Ahmednagar, Bijapur and Golconda Sultans largely got from Hindus like Shahji, Shivaji and Sambhaji—so far as the war against the Mughals was concerned—indicated (whatever their internal enmity) that foreign aggression into the Deccan was to be averted or resisted. In this attitude the Muslim Chand Bibi and Malik Amber as well as the Maratha leaders were of one mind. Exceptions to this rule were of a temperory character due to passing military exigencies. Shivaji's considered policy was to support the Deccanee Muslims against the foreign Muslims, even though his ultimate object might have been to overthrow the political domination of the Deccan even by the Deccanee Muslims.

This brings us face to face with another ticklish part of our enquiry,—viz, the Hindu-Muslim relations. The scientific historian cannot and must not shirk it. Provincialism and communalism are the Scylla and the Charybdis of the modern Indian historian. Having commented upon the former, I must not run away from the latter. Like the desire (conscious or otherwise) to glorify one's province, a rational sensitiveness towards one's religion has tended to vitiate history writing. We must look history squarely in the face, though it may be pox marked. Only by recognising a disease can we overcome it. History need not repeat itself with all its errors.

History has its warnings no less than its inspirations. In order to avoid the pitfalls we must locate the pits: as well in the writing of history as in the making of new history. To ignore or overlook this is to reduce history to propaganda.

Religion is the foundation of culture. In mediaeval times the two were inseparable. Hence it is no wonder that it powerfully influenced the conduct of men and societies. It is the task of the historian to see how exactly and in what sphere of activity and to what extent religion and culture affected individual and political relations, on the other. The wars and faction of medieval Deccan need to be re-examined from this angle.

In Hindu times, no doubt, religion did not wear a political complexion. It was essentially a matter of individual faith, and social in the sense of caste which determined the food one could eat, with whom he could eat it, whom one could marry, and where one could worship. Political fights were dynastic, where they were not due to purely personal ambitions. The only instance of faction-fight of a religious character that I know of, before the advent of the Muslims, was between the Lingayats and the Jainas. The decline of the latter was due, in no small degree, to the rise of the militant Vira-saiva sect. The conversion of the Jania-basadi of Aihole (Bijapur Dist.) into Saiva temple is a standing monument of religious fanaticism in the pre-Muslim period (Vide my "Jainism and Karnatak Culture"). On the eve of Alauddin Khilji's invasion of the Deccan sectarianism was again rampant in the Deccan—particularly on account of sharp differences between the Mahanubhavas and the Sanatanis. Allegations by the one against the other of having invited the Muslims are not proved but need to be investigated. Likewise the palace revolutions at Devagiri prior to the accession of Ramadeva Rao need to be looked into from the point of view of sectarian antagonisms. But, barring a few sporadic symptoms of this character, religion hardly influenced political happenings in mediaeval Deccan in the Hindu period. However, as I have hinted at before, cultural disruption, in the shape of the multiplicity of conflicting sects, and cultural perversities, in the shape of sacerdotal fabrication of innumerable ceremonials and rites,—along with the lack of grit and leadership on the part of Ramadeva Rao, paved the way to the Islamic conquest of the Deccan. The Yadavas were therefore, in this sense, a source not of inspiration but warning to later times. Yadavi is therefore an ominous word in more than one sense.

The constructive and political significance of the cultural reactions that ensued from the Islamic conquest of the Deccan have been discussed by me in my new Maratha History. The resurgence had no doubt a very strong religious side, but it was not less cultural in the wider sense giving rise to political organisation and military conflict.

Islam had entered Northern India as a militant and conquering faith, its character in the Deccan remained essentially the same. Under local conditions and exigencies that faith undoubtedly underwent important modifications. Its truculence, if not also its vigour, were tamed or toned down in course of time, but not until it had given rise to equally vigorous if not equally truculent reactions. Ultimately a workable modus vivendi was found socially speaking. As a community or as an important element in Deccanee society the Muslims had come to stay. They had been tolerated as well as actively patronised by the Rashtrakutas during the period of peaceful penetration by Muslims who came into the Deccan as travellers, traders or even as missionaries. But when they became successful conquerors some of the Muslim rulers did act fanatically apart from acts of war. Modern historians should not gloss over these. It is not necessary to do so. On the other hand their recognition has a wholesome moral for us which constitutes one of the salutary influences of history reading. There have been good kings as well as bad among all peoples. If there was a Humayun among the Bahmanis he was as much a hateful tyrant to the Muslims as he was to the Hindus. The invasion of Deva Raya I of Vijayanagar was as much destructive to the Muslims of the Deccan as the Muslim incursions into Vijayanagar were to Hindus. But it is important to remember the distinction between religious wars and political wars. To cite European illustrations the Thirty Years' War was a religious war, the wars between Catholic France and Protestant Germany thereafter were political wars. Once the Muslim Kingdoms of the Deccan had come to stay as permanent political entities in the South their wars ceased to be religious wars. Destruction was wrought on territories by all invaders, Hindu as well as Muslim without singling out followers of particular faiths. These were mercenary troops of both religion engaged by the belligerents. The victors were political adventurers not religious crusaders, the victims were the helpless masses among whom were Hindus and Muslims alike.

This brings me to the last point that I want to stress, viz, the Economic aspect. It is an anachronism to read modern economic motives into mediaeval Deccan history as one recent writer has attempted to do. I refer to Mr. Lajpat Pendse's book on Shivaji महाराजाची वसुधैव कुटुम्बकम्. The class-struggle theory is too controversial to be lightly touched upon But the economic condition of a people, especially from the point of view of the distribution of wealth or the good things of life, is too important as a basis of culture to be ignored or lightly dismissed Its direct bearing on the political and military struggles in mediaeval Deccan ought to be carefully and closely studied without being obsessed with doctrinal theories

In short my plea is for a total view of History uninfluenced by Provincialism or even Economic materialism

Narahari Tirtha and Kalinga Country

BY

R SUBBA RAO, M A, L T.,

HISTORY LECTURER, GOVT ARTS COLLEGE AND
VICE-PRESIDENT, A H R SOCIETY, RAJAHMUNDRA

SEVERAL stone inscriptions relating to this great religious teacher, discovered in the Sreekurmam and Simbachalam Temples and noticed in the Annual Reports of the Madras Ep Dept, were recently published in the South Indian Inscr Vol V and VI. From these, we learn that Narahari Tirtha was the disciple of Ananda Tirtha and that he lived from A D 1264 to 1293 in Kalingadesa firstly as a religious teacher in Bhamdeva's reign (1264-78) and secondly as the governor to the great Kalinga Emperor Narasimha II (1278-1305).

Sri Kurmam Temple Inscr No 1233 dated S'1193 or A D 1271 records the fact that Bhanudeva's minister granted the village of Khoma or Kornu in Ganjam Dt for the welfare of the King and for offerings to God by order of the King's protegee, the sage Narahari Tirtha, to fifteen Vaishnava Brahmin Nayakas. Some of them were holding offices like Sthapati (Head of the Temples), Upadhaya (Teacher), Puranapati (Reciter of Puranas), Sasanadhikari (Keeper of royal records), and Senadhiswara (Head of the army). The sage himself presented into the treasury of God the village of Kudupri. The same Temple Inscr Nos. 1251 and 1252 dated S'1186 or A D 1264, the last year of Narasimha I's reign and the first of Vira Bhanu's record the gift of 3 Madas or Nishkas (gold coins) by the Sage for feeding Vaishnava Brahmins on the occasion of Sri-jayanti festival for the happy delivery of Srikrishna by Devakidevi.

This is clear that this sage enjoyed the special favour of King Bhanudeva of (Kalinga) Orissa (1264-78). The names, Narasimha and Bhanudeva, taken up by every alternate King from the beginning of the 13th Century to the middle of the 15th Century, the several land and cash gifts made for the benefit of Vaishnavite gods and Brahmins and the construction of new Vaishnavite Temples as at Arasavilli (Ganjam Dt.) and Konarka (Orissa) clearly suggest new Vaishnavite influence introduced into the Kalinga Empire by both Narahari Tirtha and his followers. The Kings that ruled before Narasimha I were all ardent Saivites. For this new religious change in both Kalinga and Andhra Kingdoms, Narahari Tirtha was greatly responsible. He was one of the greatest ecclesiastical statesmen of the times. The same Temple Inscr. No 1288 dated S'1204 or A D 1282 which belongs to the 5th reigned year of Narasimha II states that Narahari was employed as a Mandaliku or Provincial governor and that in his presence, several valuable gifts were made for god of Srikurmani. This statement is supported by Literature. The Madhwa Vijaya Kavya and Narahariyat stotram state that this sage was initiated into Madhwa or Dvaita cult by Ananda Tirthi or Madhwacharya and asked to go to the Kalinga Emperor to obtain from him the images of Sita and Rama. Hence he reached Kalinga Capital and acted as Regent to the boy King Narasimha II for 12 years and obtained as Reward the images which were duly handed over to the Guru. Narahari spread his Dvaita Cult through out Kalinga and Andhra kingdoms and died on the bank of River Tungabhadra in the Chakra Tirtha monastery built by himself. He died about 1333. His regency lasted for 12 years from A D 1281 to 1293 when he resided from Kalinga. An inscr. of the Temple No 1172 dated S'1225 or A D 1293 records that Narahari, the disciple of Ananda, set up images of Rama, Seeta and Lakshmana in Sreekurmam Temple and endowed for god's worship in his Treasury 51 ganda madas, 16 Kalsapanas some utensils and 19 Saries. Several inscr relating to him are also found in Simhachalam Temple (vide S I I Vol. VI). The oddadi mateya Vamsa kings became converts to his Cult and built monasteries and made several gifts to the god. An inscr No. 1171 S'1203 or A D 1281 found in Srikurmam states that he protected the country against the invasion of the Savaras and built a temple for Yogananda Narasimha. He was mainly responsible for spreading Dvaita Cult in Kalinga and Andhra.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE UNDER THE BAHMANIDES

BY

ABDUL HAFEEZ SIDDIQI, B Sc, LL M, HYDERABAD (D.A.)

THE medieval period of the Deccan is rich in history. The Bahmanide rule, in particular, which formed the first great Muslim Empire in the Deccan, has left memorable high water-marks in the medieval culture of this country. Their administration of the country, their organisation of the Central and Provincial governments, and their contribution to the medieval culture as a whole, are memorable events of the past which can never be forgotten. Their judicial organisation in particular, which was a part of their general administration, is by itself a clear proof of the genius and sound administrative ability of the Bahmanides.

In a short monograph like this, it is rather impossible to present a vivid picture of the Bahmanide conception of Justice and the nature and working of their judicial administration. It needs at least the span of a book. We shall, however, try to bring to light the salient features of the administration of justice under the Bahmanides which, despite the shortcomings of the age and the want of facilities, seems to have no parallel in the contemporary states and which in fact, according to its efficiency and highly developed form, seems to be better than the present age.

Origin of the Bahmanide Institutions.

The Bahmanides, undoubtedly, had their own form of judicial administrations, but it was not of their own creation. As a matter of fact, they inherited this institution, along with others, from that sacred land which was the birthplace of the mighty Muslim nation. The Muslim institutions of government and administration came to India first through the Arabs in Sindh,¹ and then through Baghdad and Turkistan, they came to Lahore² and thence to Delhi.³ And, when the Deccan became a part of the Delhi Sultanate, the judicial administration of the Deccan, like its general administrative machinery, formed a part of the provincial organization of the Sultanate. When during the period of the decline of Mohamad Tughluq's reign, there sprang up in the Deccan a new flourishing Empire, the founders of this mighty kingdom had before them the model of the Delhi Administration which by itself, was highly organized and was unparalleled in that age⁴. The Bahmanide Institutions were therefore naturally influenced by the ultimate which had, by itself, inherited all its institutions, through various means, from Arabia. Yet the Bahmanides modelled and reshaped their institutions according to the local needs and gave a local colour to what they inherited from Delhi. It is therefore a study of the Muslim administration of Justice on the Deccan soil which forms an interesting piece of study.

The Bahmanide Conception of Justice and the Rule of Shara.

The Bahmanides in general were great followers of the Shara. It is rather strange that during their rule, the Deccan had become the centre of the learned and great Muslim scholars and preachers. They had their influence not only on the public at large, but even the Sultans were influenced by their wise and lawful guidance.

Hasan was the first king to introduce Islam and enforce Muslim law through a settled government in the Deccan.⁵ He was a strict adherent of the Shara. He tried to follow even the Muslim law of war to his utmost, e.g., he distributed the booty or 'Chanimah' amongst his fighting men⁶ and this practice was also followed by his successors⁷. Mohamad Shah I was very much particular in guarding the rights of his people. Firoz was very strict in observing the laws of the Shara⁸. In the words of Haji Mohamad Khandhari, he lived such a saintly life that he earned his living by writing a part of the Quran every day⁹.

منکرد - و حرم معتبرم لئاسها را نقش کرده می و روح و معاش خود را
از آن مهیا ساخت"

Ahmad Shah was also a very strict adherent of the Muslim law.¹⁰ People used to call him 'Wali', a saint, and he was remembered as the 'Just Monarch' or Imam-e-Adil¹¹ Allauddin II and Mohamad Shah Lashkari were also great rulers who tried their best to enforce Muslim Law.

We shall now see what great authors and men of opinion have said about the justice and equity of the Bahmanides. Their opinions throw light on their conception of justice. Nizamuddin Aulia had said about Hasan و داد را الی دین و داد 1.e., king of the country and promoter of the Faith and Justice¹². When Hasan entered Gulbarga after his triumphant victory, people welcomed him thus نگینی ہم حوی ارداد نسی - نکاہست مردم ہم ریاد نسی

1.e., the world seems beautiful only due to your justice¹³. Ali bin Azizullah has much praise for his just and equitable nature¹⁴. Isami, the Firdausi of India, says about his justice¹⁵

بعدش رنداد دوران حعل - رعادلش هواے حهاں معتدل
علا الدین آن شاه گیتی پناه - کم آسوده در عهد او داد و داد (عصای مصر)
و ارین پس کشادی در عدل و داد - ره فتم بستنی ارین خوش نلا
(عصای مصر ۵۷۴)

Hasan was so particular about administration of justice that even in his last days when he was seriously ill, he used to sit in a palace near the Durbar and see the complainants with his own eyes.¹⁶ According to Ferishta, he also used to hold the Durbar every day both in the morning and in the evening, and used to dispense justice despite his weakness¹⁷.

According to Malkapuri, Mohamad Shah I was better than his father in justice and fairplay¹⁸. Ali bin Azizullah addresses Mohamad Shah II as Sultanul-Adil and highly praises his judicial administration¹⁹. Ali has also great admiration for Firoz and praises his just nature in high terms²⁰. Rafiuddin Shirazi also says about Firoz that he was unequalled in justice and fairplay.²¹ Ahmad Shah was, according to Ali, benefactor of the people and harsh to the oppressor.²²

With these opinions of others, let us now see what the rulers themselves have to say about justice. Their sayings also go to prove their ideal of justice. The founder of the kingdom advised his son Mohamad Shah I on his deathbed²³

رئیس دند و گنج پرور بخش - که فرحام هم بیکی آید به پیش
پناه به دادم آفرین نادوس - که اردد حر او بیست فریاد رس

Mohamad Shah I also advised Mujahid Shah to be a just and lawful monarch²⁴ Firoz, likewise, advised Ahmad Shah to administer justice as his first duty, to protect his people and to behave well with his relatives²⁵ In his long advice to his son, Allauddin Ahmad Shah also included administration of justice as the king's greatest duty and said²⁶

عدل و انصاف را محتاج دولت و ناری سلطنت دادند

After the opinions of the Sultans, let us now consider their actions which will enable us to form a clear picture of their sense of justice. If the story of the coins connected with Allauddin Hasan has any truth, it alone goes to prove the just nature of the founder²⁷ When Ismail Mukh raised the banner of revolt and was killed, Hasan left all his relatives untouched,²⁸ nay, he even pardoned all those who had followed and prompted Ismail.²⁹ It is also strange that Ismail's son Bahadur Khan was honoured with the title of Amirul-Umera, and his daughter was married to Prince Mujahid³⁰ There was no distinction of great and small for Hasan in administering justice. He never interfered with the Hindu religion and his Hindu subjects were free in their personal laws³¹ Hasan never killed a Brahmin in his lifetime³² Hindus used to hold him as their 'Avatar' and the Muslims as 'Wali'³³

When Mohamad Shah I was found fault with by Hazrat Shaikh Zainuddin for his addiction to liquor and for his not following the Shara law, the Sultan refrained from wine and closed all the wine-shops in the city. In accordance with the Shaikh's advice, Sultan also ordered his governors to put an end to thieves and the dacoits in their respective jurisdictions. Consequently, the Shara was strictly observed in the State³⁴ Mujahid, in accordance with his father's advice, never ordered for a general massacre³⁵ Mohamad Shah II used to say that the treasury was a public trust in the hands of the king.³⁶ He gave grants to the blind and treated them with such kindness that even healthy persons sometimes made themselves blind so as to enjoy the facilities³⁷

Firoz was once looking through the window of his palace. He saw a Faqir going along with a bowl in his hand. He called for him and looked into the bowl. There were some dry pieces of 'Jawar' and this touched Firoz to the quick. He ordered that Jawar should not be cultivated in his kingdom and that the cultivation of wheat should be encouraged instead. He also constructed special asylums for the poor and the disabled where they were given bread and 'Halva,' a special sweet preparation.³⁸

Ahmad Shah did not even spare the grandson of Hazrat Banda Nawaz of Gulbarga. He was punished for drinking, in public, wine and adultery according to the Shara. Ferishta therefore says that people forgot even the story of Anu-Sherwan.³⁹

Allauddin II passed orders against beggary and idle living. No one could beg in the Metropolis. They were induced to labour and those who disobeyed were either imprisoned and forced to do some work or were asked to leave the city.⁴⁰ During the reign of Muhamad Shah Lashkari, administration of justice was so prompt and the oppressor received such a quick punishment that in the words of Ali bin Azizullah⁴¹

نکردی هیچ کس از ظلم فریاد - قنای گل نگشتی پاره ارناد
بهر مطرب کسی زهر نلودی - زهر هم کس نکر سوسن نبودی

The just nature of the Bahmanides is proved by the fact that they did not even spare princes and the royal family was not immune from punishment. Mujahid, for example, was punished by Muhamad Shah I for robbing some coins from the treasury.⁴² Toleration with the non-Muslim subjects is also a case in point. The Hindus were free from the Jizia, though the law demanded Jizia from them.⁴³ They even built temples for their Hindu subjects and gave them grants.⁴⁴ They were also included in the administrative machinery.⁴⁵ The Bahmanides did not give place to religious bigotry in justice.⁴⁶

The Law.

Let us now glance at the law which was followed by the Bahmanide Courts. The Muslims that came to India were generally the Sunnis of the Hanafi persuasion. The majority of the Muslims coming to India in the medieval ages consisted of the Turks, and all the Turks, whether Seljuks, Ghaznavides, or Ghoris, were Hanafis.⁴⁷ Mahmud of Ghazna, and then the Ghoris and Shamsi Sultans, had obtained their recognition from Baghdad, and the Caliphs at Baghdad were also of the Hanafi sect. Though in Turkistan there were other sects too, yet at the completion of the Indian conquest the Hambalite and the Shafite Schools enjoyed little patronage at Khorasan and Transoxania. As the Ulama hailed chiefly from these places, they brought Hanafi religion with them to India.

The Bahmanides too, like the Sultans of Delhi, were Sunnis of the Hanafi School⁴⁸ and the majority of the Ulama that came to the Deccan either from the North or from outside, was of the Hanafi persuasion. Thus the State religion was Hanafi.⁴⁹

In the administration of justice, the courts had to follow, like the Delhi Sultanate, the Holy Quran, the Sunan, the consensus of opinion of the Prophet's followers, the Ijma, and also the individual judgments. The decisions of the cases by the Delhi Sultanate were also like precedents before the Bahmanides.

The Judicial Department.

The Bahmanide Court were organised and modelled according to the Shara,⁵⁰ and the judicial powers and functions were carried on by the Qazis.⁵¹ The courts used to follow and enforce the Shara law. The Sultans themselves used to inspect the courts and also used to read the Qazis' decisions.⁵² They also guided the Qazis on certain points to reach the right decision.⁵³

It is not possible here to show the gradual development of the Bahmanide Judiciary and to give its complete account. We shall, however, see, in brief, the arrangements both at the Centre and in the Provinces.

Courts at the Centre

There were two kinds of courts at the centre—civil and criminal.⁵⁴ The highest court of criminal appeals, and to a certain extent, also the original court, was the Durbar where the Sultan himself used to dispense justice.⁵⁵ The High Court for Civil and Criminal Appeals was the Sadr Adalat of Gulbarga which was presided over by the Sadr or the Qaziul-Quzzat.⁵⁶ There was also a "Dastar-e Shahi" presided over the Wakil-e-Mutlaq. Here came cases in appeal from the Sadr Adalat, and the Daftar only forwarded the appeals to the king with its due legal opinion.⁵⁷ In other words, this Daftar was like the Judicial Committee in Hyderabad today. Sadr Jahan was also the highest official of the Ecclesiastical Department and consequently, all religious matters and disputes came to him in that capacity.⁵⁸ Besides these civil and criminal courts, there was also a Subordinate Criminal Court and a Subordinate Civil Court at the Centre and both of them were presided over by the Qazi-e-Gulbarga.⁵⁹ In addition to this, there was a Kotwal's Court exercising original jurisdiction in petty criminal cases.⁶⁰ There was also a Muhtasab's Court presided over by the Muhtasab and a court of the Qazi-e-Askar presided over by the Qazi of the Cantonment.⁶¹

It will be interesting to note here that the Sadr, who was the highest official of the judiciary, was also one of the eight ministers at the centre who formed the Bahmanide Cabinet.⁶² In other words, the head of the Judiciary had his voice in the central administrative machinery. This was, more or less, like the modern arrangements at Hyderabad where the Sadrul-Maham-e-Adalat or the Law Member is the head both of the Judiciary and the Ecclesiastical Department, and also a member of the Executive Council.

Judicial Officers at the Centre

After having had an idea of the courts at the centre, let us now see the judicial officers. First come the Sadr or Sadr Jahan who was not only the Qaziul-Quzat of the Sadr Adalat-e-Gulbarga, but also the head of the Empire's Judiciary and also a Minister in the Cabinet. There were under the Sadr Qazis, Muftis, Muhtasabs, Foujdars, and Daroghas etc., who formed the Staff of the Sadr Adalat. The Sadr was appointed by the king and was directly responsible to him.⁶³ This important office was often held by extraordinary personalities. The first Sadr, for example, was the great scholar and jurist, Moulana Sadrus-Shariff Samarqandi.⁶⁴ He never tolerated the interference of the king in judicial matters as, according to Orthodox practice and Muslim traditions, the judiciary was independent of the Executive and the Muslim ruler had no right to interfere with justice. Qazi Sadrudin Shariff went "on leave" outside the kingdom and refused to resume duties unless the Sultan gave him an undertaking that the powers of the Qazis would not be taken away in future⁶⁵ He was succeeded by a personality like Mīr Fazlullah Anju who was the pupil of Allama Taftazani⁶⁶ Sadre Jahan was a very influential person as he had close contact with the king⁶⁷ He was next to the Wakil-e Mutlaq in power.

Wakil-e-Mutlaq or the Prime Minister being the next to the king, used to exercise the king's powers in his absence⁶⁸ He was also the presiding officer of the Daftar-e-Shahi and in this way, was connected with the Judiciary⁶⁹

There were Qazis in every city and town, and they enjoyed a respectful position. Great jurists and men of high character were generally appointed to this office. In the beginning the Qazi exercised only judicial powers, but later on, he was also to do certain other duties, such as guarding the interests and estates of the minor, administering the Waqf etc.

Attached to the Qazi's court there was also a Mufti who was to assist him in juristic matters⁷⁰ In the Sadr Adalat and also in every Qazi's court, there was also a Muhtasab whose duty was to look after the public morals and to guard the weak against oppression⁷¹ They were expected to teach the ways of Islam to the people and see to its practice⁷²

Hajib and Barbak were also connected with the Judiciary. Barbak was, in fact, an officer at the Durbar who used to look after the royal etiquette being observed by those present. He also used to make arrangements of seats at the royal court. Barbak's assistants were called Hajibs who used to stand between the people and the king and used to introduce people to the king⁷³ There was no Amir-e-Hajib in the Bahmani Durbar as was at Delhi. But we find, however, Barbak and Naib-Barbak in the Deccan. Sikandar Khan Barbak and Malik Shadi Naib-e-Barbak was appointed by the founder alone⁷⁴ There were also some Hajibs, and the king always used to keep some reliable Hajibs with him. For this reason, probably, they were called Hajib-e-Khas⁷⁵ The leader of the Hajibs was styled Syed-ul-Hujab⁷⁶ Isami speaks of a title of Hajib-e-Qissa being conferred on the Qazi of Daulatabad.⁷⁷

According to Ali bin Azizullah, there was a Hajib-e-Qasba,⁷⁸ and obviously, these are new offices which were not found at Delhi

Beside the Hajib and the Barbak, there were also the Foujdari and the Darogha connected with the judiciary. In criminal cases, the Foujdari used to write the statements of the witnesses and send the file to the Qazi who gave the judgment.⁷⁹ The Darogha was the Executive Officer of the court.⁸⁰ There were also, in each court, Katibs, Munshis, Khazanadars, peons etc

The Provincial Judiciary.

The provincial organization, like the central, was also well developed. The Sultans used to pay more attention to the provinces than the centre. The result was that the whole government machinery in the provinces functioned as effectively as that of the Centre.⁸¹

The Tarafdar was the highest official in the Taraf or Suba who represented the Sultan in the provinces.⁸² In every Taraf, there was a Sadr who was directly under the Sadr Jahan or Qazi-ul-Quzzat.⁸³ For example, Moulana Abdul Ghani was the Sadr at Berar.⁸⁴ Beside the Sadr, there were also Qazis, Muftis, Muhtasabs, Hajibs, Foujdars, and Daroghas,⁸⁵ who represented the central officers in the provinces. Like the Taraf, we find such officers also in the Sarkars and Parganas.⁸⁶ In villages, which were the lowest administrative units, there were assistants of Qazis, Muhtasabs, Foujdars⁸⁷ etc

Precedents and Punishments

The Bahmanides in general, used to pity more than to punish.⁸⁸ But despite their kind-heartedness, the Sultans seldom interfered with the Qazi's orders for Qisas or retaliation.⁸⁹ The Bahmanides did always try to enforce the laws of the Shariat to the best of their ability, though the Muslim Criminal Law could not be followed in toto.

The rebels were punished more severely than any, and a rebellion was considered as a very serious crime. Though the rebels were not brought before the Qazi and they were punished by the Sultans directly, yet, before passing the sentence, the Muftis and the jurists were consulted. For example, Allauddin Hasan obtained the Fatwa before punishing Ismail Mukh⁹⁰

Thieves and dacoits came next. Mohamad Shah I killed 20 thousand dacoits within 6 or 7 months⁹¹. Tyrants and oppressors who teased the people were severely punished and the gamblers and men of bad character were also punished⁹².

Melting of the coins was also considered a serious crime. When the 'Sarrafis' of the Deccan began to destroy the Bahmanide coins continuously and did not give way despite persistent warnings, all of them were killed⁹³.

Murder was prescribed for murder. Even the one who aided in murder, was also hanged to death.⁹⁴

The rights of the merchants and people at large were jealously guarded by the Bahmanides. They even waged wars to that effect. During the reign of Mohamad Shah I, for example, some traders were bringing horses to Gulbarga. The Raja of Vellumpatam⁹⁵ waylaid them and usurped the horses. Mohamad Shah attacked the Raja⁹⁶.

A Syed traveller once complained against Sher Malik, a respectable and famous Amir, for having maltreated and dishonoured him. The Sultan hanged him for the crime⁹⁷.

Prince Mujahid robbed some golden coins from the royal Treasury. He was flogged for it⁹⁸. The grandson of Hazrat Banda Nawaz drank wine and indulged in adultery, he was also publicly flogged⁹⁹.

There is also an interesting case of whoredom or Zina. A woman was brought before the Qazi for having connection with four men. Questioned by the Qazi, she replied that as a man was allowed to have four wives, she thought a woman was also allowed likewise to have four husbands, now as she knew it was a crime, she would not do it hereafter. The Qazi was a bit puzzled as to do what. Sultan Muhammad II who had been to the Darul Qaza on a round during the course of inspection, asked the Qazi to relieve the woman as 'doubt relieved one of Hadd', (Criminal punishment)¹⁰⁰.

An Estimate of Sultan Quli Qutb Shah

BY

NOSHIR A MISTRI, M A., BOMBAY

THE story of the phenomenal rise of Sultan Quli to the sovereignty of Golconda is one of the romances of Indian History. He came as an adventurer to this land, a knight-errant in quest of a career. And he came at an opportune time when the great Bahmani Sultanate was rapidly heading towards its fall. It was a period of unrest and uncertainty when kingdoms could be made and unmade. A daring soldier, inspired by the confidence that his star was in the ascendance, might rise above the tumult, baffle the storm and yoke it to his advantage, and carve out, at the point of his sword, a kingdom for himself. And yet, he would have to go about very cautiously if he should not be crushed by the contending forces of his times. Others, like himself, might be eager to fish in troubled waters, rivals who will have to be outdistanced. He would have to wait patiently and cautiously for a favourable concourse of circumstances to declare himself.

And it is these circumstances that created Sultan Quli's career in India, and shaped his conduct. He was a PARDESI, a foreign adventurer whose youthful imagination had pictured the Deccan as the El Dorado of his dreams.¹ The Bahmani Sultans had deliberately adopted the policy of encouraging the 'Foreigners' and entrusting to them the highest offices in the State. This alienated the DECCANIS who were the domiciled Mahommedans. The mutual hatreds and strifes of these parties convulsed the State. There were massacres and reprisals.

Sultan Quli's Loyalty to Mahmud Shah Bahmani

It was when the Deccan was seething with these passions that Sulatan Quli arrived at the Bahmani Court. He was a newcomer, and had no local standing, as some of his illustrious contemporaries like Fathullah Imad Shah or Ahmed Nizam Shah. They could count upon local support and local sympathy to sustain their ventures. Sultan Quli had to start his career with the initial disadvantage of being a PARDESI, and at a time, too, when Foreigners were in a precarious condition in the Deccan. He had necessarily to fall back upon the favour of the Sovereign whom he served, however worthless an imbecile that Prince might prove to be. To maintain himself, it was necessary for Sultan Quli to preserve his DE JURE status as the trusted servant of the Bahmani Sultan. That would confer legitimacy on his actions, and justify him in the eyes of the people.

1 "the Deccan and India were always present to my thoughts." So Sultan Quli is reported to have said before he came to this land. Quoted by Tarikh-i-Mahmud Qutb Shahi, pp 32-33. Cf Briggs, m, p 341.

Sultan Quli, in this sense, lacked some of the advantages his contemporary war-lords possessed. And that circumstance, even if others were wanting, would have decided him in the course of his conduct. He must needs stand by the Bahmani throne as its loyal supporter, and gain by it. The Adil Shah, the Barid Shah, and the Nizam Shah could act with profit to themselves only if they pounced upon the dying Sultanate, and snatched each for himself what he could lay hands on. It was only by going into rebellion that they could hope to realise their ambitions.

Far otherwise was it with Sultan Quli. He had everything to gain by remaining faithful. He was increasing in power by "the abundance of royal favours conferred on him"²

Sultan Quli was consistently faithful to his sovereign Mahmud Shah Bahmani so long as he lived. It is difficult to say, however, whether loyalty was an innate virtue, or dictated by expediency. Possibly, in Sultan Quli's case, his loyalty might have been as much dictated by his good nature as by expediency. Whatever the attitude of the Barid Shah, the Nizam Shah, and the Adil Shah towards their royal master, the attitude of Sultan Quli, we may take it, was loyal to the very last.³ He reverently mentions Mahmud Shah's name in the Khutba of Jama' Masjid at Golconda.⁴ Sadr-i-Jehan, the author of the Marghub-ul-Kulub, asserts that Sultan Quli always refused the invitation of Qasim Barid and Fathulla Imad ul-Mulk to rebel, and sieze by violence the Bahmani districts in the vicinity of his government," contenting himself with the estates conferred on him."⁵

So long as there was at least the shadow of a Sultanate, Sultan Quli was perhaps content to describe himself as the faithful and trusted servant of the Bahmani Sultan. But he certainly

2 Burhan i Ma'sir, original, p. 155. Indian Antiquary, Vol. 28, p. 315.

3 Ali Ibn Aziz Allah Tabataba, the author of Burhan i Ma'sir, indeed makes a statement that seems to militate against the general view of Sultan Quli's consistent loyalty till his master's death. "In the year 921 (A. D. 1515) Malik Barid i Mumalik, Malik Kutb ul Mulk, Malik Dastur i Mumalik Dmar went to the royal capital and laid siege to the fortress of Bidar."—Burhan i Ma'sir, original, pp. 161-162, Indian Antiquary, Vol. 28, p. 319. We have no contemporary evidence, and even Tabataba admits eventually after consulting all the histories he had before him was that so long as the Sovereign was alive, all the amirs, wazirs and maliks "did not withdraw their heads from the collars of obedience and submission."—See Burhan i Ma'sir, Original, pp. 161-66, and Indian Antiquary, Vol. 28 pp. 319-322.

4 An Inscription of A. D. 1518. He is found still making mention of Sultan Mahmud Shah Bahmani. Epigraphia Indo-Moslemica, 1915-16, pp. 19-20.

5 Quoted by Tanikh i Mahomadi Qutb Shahi, p. 97. Briggs, II, p. 332.

appears to have proclaimed his independence even during the lifetime of Mahmud Shah Bahmani. Ferishta is emphatic and makes a definite statement that Sultan Quli declared himself independent in the year 918 A.H.⁶ This may not have affected his loyalty to Mahmud Shah which was a matter of personal attachment. Even after he assumed the regal state "he used to send annually magnificent presents to Mahmood Shah Bahmuny of Bidur"⁷

In that age of treachery and duplicity, Sultan Quli was indeed like a rock of integrity that nothing could move. But it would be wrong to say that sovereignty was an after-thought, and forced upon him when there was no other alternative, and when his own officers earnestly urged him on the ground that "they had no one else whom they could acknowledge as such."⁸ Sultan Quli himself tells us that when he and his uncle proceeded together towards India, he already fancied himself a king, because of the prophecy of his spiritual pastor, Shah Nur-ud-din that he should "one day be a king over a portion of Hindoostan"⁹ He also took his solemn pledge, as he tells us, "I also swore by the Prophet and his descendant Aly, that if I ever succeeded in establishing my independence, I would promote the faith of the followers of the twelve Imams, in parts where the banners of the faithful had never before waved"¹⁰

That Sultan Quli was absolutely disinterested, as the Tarikh-i-Mahmad Qutb Shahi would have us believe, it would require more unimpeachable testimony to establish. Sultan Quli was a much better man than his contemporaries, not fickle and treacherous as some of them, loyal and helpful in the face of temptations. But, it must be said, that he too had his aspirations and ambitions. Only in his case, his very loyalty helped to further them.

As King.

Be the circumstances that led to Sultan Quli's assumption of Golconda sovereignty what they may, as the events proved, if any one was deserving of such exaltation, it was he indeed. If he was not a born king, he was nevertheless every inch a king. He was endowed with such qualities of heart and intellect that would have singled him out as a ruler of men in any age or clime. He was a war-lord who led his men to victory. He compelled loyalty in every stout heart. He had also the qualities that made him a great sovereign.

6 Ferishta (Briggs, m, pp. 322-23). According to the Tarikh-i-Mahmud Qutb Shahi, Sultan Quli proclaimed himself asking after the death of Sultan Mahmud Shah Bahmani. Tarikh-i-Mahmud Qutb Shahi, p. 97. Briggs, m, p. 352.

Sultan Quli was a cultured and an accomplished monarch. He had early received "excellent education"¹¹ It was both secular and spiritual. His secular education fitted him out for a warrior and an administrator. It seems he early gave promise of what he would be so that his own people looked up to him as "the hope of his tribe."¹² He considerably improved his education by the opportunities he had at the Court of the Bahmani Sultan of Bidar.¹³

The first of the Qutb Shahs was thus no barbarian but a cultured prince whose nature was refined, both by what he learnt and by what he achieved. He had a keen aesthetic sense, and his love of art found expression in the noble edifices he built to adorn his fortress city. The Jumai Masjid is a monument that has received the impress of his genius. He was the pioneer of a new style in Indian architecture, and its inception gives us glimpses into an aspect of this remarkable man's life which otherwise we may miss, drowned as we may be in the crowded military annals of the reign.

As General

A man of culture and a lover of art, it was in war, however, that Sultan Quli excelled. He was pre-eminently a warrior, and the first soldier of his time. He was always in harness, compelled by the fickle, if stern necessities of war. He led his men in war, and took the field in person. He shared the dangers of the battle with the meanest of his soldiers, and none knew better how to give blows and take blows. Danger nerved him to heroic endeavour.

Sultan Quli was an unparalleled strategist and a judicious general, but above all, he was a leader who could enthuse his men and goad them to fight with the valour of giants.¹⁴ Seldom did he fail by appeals to turn the tide of battle, and snatch victory in the face of defeat. He always kept a body of cavalry in reserve which was directed only to move when it received orders.¹⁵ He always kept a keen watch with his eagle eye on every section of the front and at the opportune moment charged in person at the head of the reserve with tempestuous force into the enemy's ranks. Such a manoeuvre invariably turned the fate of the day.¹⁶

One of the favourite tactics of Quli was to feign a retreat, lure the enemy by tempting him to pursue, and turn back all of a sudden and inflict a smashing defeat.¹⁷

Telangana was studded with innumerable forts. The gaining of a battle did not immediately decide the conquest of the land. The Hindus withdrew to the shelter of the hill-fortresses from which it was a very difficult task, indeed, to dislodge them. Sultan Quli very often attempted to take the forts by escalade by a general assault from all sides.¹⁸

The Qutb Shahi monarch was a dashing and impetuous cavalry leader. His courage proved contagious. He charged in person just when the battle had reached a critical stage.¹⁹ When a fort was to be stormed he was always at the van of the attacking party. His personal bravery often turned the fortunes of the day.

It was Sultan Quli's scientific generalship that gave him victory in his battles. Sometimes his confidence and audacity may appear to be amazing, as at the battle of Palunchnur.²⁰ But he had just confidence in himself and in God.

The Qutb Shah excelled in fighting regular battles, conducting regular campaigns and regular sieges. The Hindus were compelled sometimes to vary the plan of warfare, and take to guerilla tactics, especially in the Kondavidu campaign.²¹ This so much annoyed the Sultan that he quitted Kondavidu.²² If the Hindus had learnt wisdom from this success, and had trusted to guerilla warfare rather than to the fortunes of regular battles, it would indeed have gone very bad for Sultan Quli.

As Conqueror.

As a conqueror, Sultan Quli was ruthless. He gave no quarter to the vanquished. Sometimes he, indeed, permitted a defeated garrison "to proceed whithersoever they choose,"²³ and even to march out "with all their private property."²⁴ When he found himself before the walls of Khammamet, the historian tells us that he was unwilling to spill human blood wantonly,²⁵ and first tried the methods of persuasion.²⁶ But the Telangana campaigns were in general very sanguinary indeed. After reducing Khammamet, the victor gave no quarter "killing every man, woman, and child in the place."²⁷

As a conqueror, Sultan Quli could claim the spoils of war. After the capture of an enemy's town, he sometimes distributed on the spot among his troops whatever treasures fell into his possession²⁸. Sometimes, he gave a general permission to his troops to plunder a captured fort²⁹.

Religion and Religious Policy.

Sultan Quli was a deeply religious man, conscious throughout his life of a mission to be fulfilled³⁰. He had early in his career taken the solemn vow that he would spread the banners of the faithful where they had never before waved³¹. He believed that, in his campaigns against the Hindus of Telangana, he was waging a Jihad or Crusade. He wished to be a Ghazi or victor in a Holy war³². In his fanaticism, he consumed the temples of the Infidels to ashes and built mosques in their stead³³. He was a bigot in his wars with the Hindus. He was determined to exterminate if possible, the enemies of the faith.

The Qutb Shah was, personally, perhaps, very sincere in his religious professions. He was a man of God, understanding Him and worshipping Him as a true believer. There does not appear to be any strain of hypocrisy in his conduct. And he was conscious, too, that he was waging God's battles. It was his invariable custom to dedicate his work to God and ask for His help³⁴.

Sultan Quli, however, was no missionary, whatever stray statements and professions might imply. He did not feel the irresistible impulse to convert the Hindus to his faith. His idea was to defeat and reduce them to subjection. He was prepared to treat with them, and grant them terms if they submitted and paid tribute. They thereafter could rebuild their temples, and follow the idolatrous worship of their Gods.

The success of a new faith lies in its appeal to convince and win the hearts of men. The Hindus of Telangana could not have been impressed by Islam that came to them in the guise of ruthless foes who massacred and plundered, destroyed and laid waste all that they held sacred and dear. They certainly could not see in their Sultan the noblest representative of his faith. Indeed, to them he was a man not very much above the ethics of the age³⁵.

35 Cf. the Nalgonda incident.

And above all, the soldiers Sultan Quli led to battle were not holy warriors, but professional fighting men, mostly actuated by mercenary motives, who were indeed ready to fight their Muslim brethren as readily as they fought the infidel Hindus. Sultan Quli himself felt, or pretended to feel, some qualms of conscience when faced with the prospect of waging war with his co-religionists³⁶. He appealed to Imad Shah saying that 'all the faithful are brethren'³⁶. He protested to Ismail Adil Shah against "the system of the faithful attacking each other at the instigation of infidels"³⁷. But in all this, he was perhaps actuated by the desire to find a justification for what he did. For, when he attacked Imad Shah and Quwam-ul Mulk, it was not the first time he was fighting a Muslim enemy. The closing scenes of the Bahmani Sultanate which he himself had witnessed and in some of which he had himself was actor, were full of such internecine conflicts in the fold of Islam.

It is futile to read a religious motive into every one of Sultan Quli's campaigns. Religion indeed served as A POSTERIORI justification but in themselves, they appear to have been waged for very mundane and secular gains indeed.

As Statesman.

An accomplished Prince, an indomitable warrior and an earnest "believer", Sultan Quli possessed qualities and talents that would have marked him out in any age or country. It is difficult, however, to estimate him as a Statesman. It is not enough that a king should conquer, he should have political sagacity to preserve what he has conquered. He should have administrative capacity to settle the subjugated territories.

The settlement of conquered territories is no easy task. After conquest must come reconciliation. The defeated peoples have to be won over by a treatment and a policy calculated to disarm their antipathy to the rule of the conqueror.

The government of a kingdom by a system of military garrisons or camps may be necessary as a war-time measure. But it would be pitifully inadequate, and incurably false, if it should be extended to peace-time. And especially when the rulers belong to a religion intolerably of other faiths, a deep chasm is effected between the rulers and the ruled. The Hindus may be made to feel that their lot was to be the drawers of water and hewers of wood, and the Muslims may become possessed of all the pride of a conquering caste.

A sovereign, by judicious concessions and politic neutrality may succeed in winning the hearts of his subjects, even though they be of different faith. But if he should consider the spreading of his banners of his own religion to be a matter of conscience which as a missionary he cannot abandon, there could be no reconciliation. He can maintain himself only by superior force, and the only peace that he can give to his kingdom is armed peace.

Sultan Quli was a new-comer to India. He lacked the experience that could come only by a long period of domicile during which, by a slow process of adoption, adjustment and acclimatisation one could almost become a child of the soil. His experience of the Court of the Bahmani Sultanate, and his experience, too, of his contemporary amirs must have taught him, that if he would be a ruler of men, and that a successful ruler, he would do well to leave religion take care of itself and to maintain an attitude of benevolent neutrality in a country like India with a preponderant Hindu population. The last thing that he should do is to create a feeling of fear in the people that their religion is insulted and threatened.

Sultan Quli's fitful campaigns in Telangana, and his destruction and desecration of Hindu places of worship only aggravated the feelings of estrangement between the conquerors and the Hindu subjects who were goaded to interminable revolts, and to form confederacies of all Hindu chiefs with the object of freeing the land of the Muslim conqueror.³⁸

The Hindus had further to be convinced, if they were to reconcile themselves to the rule of the Sultan Quli and acquiesce in his sovereignty, that his administration was better than what they had before, and that the condition of the people would be infinitely better. There is no evidence, however, to suppose that Sultan Quli introduced a better system of administration in the territories which he conquered, neither is there reason to suppose that he introduced measures to promote the welfare of the people. On the other hand, we have reason to maintain that Sultan Quli consistently regarded Telangana as a defeated people. For he usually assumed the right of the conqueror to plunder the land which he conquered, the right to the spoils of war as the prize of victory. As sovereign, he was entitled surely to any public treasury that he could lay hands upon in the conquered cities. As sovereign, he was equally entitled to confiscate the property of the rebels. But if he distributed the spoils among his soldiers, or if he allowed them to plunder at will, surely it is not the right of a sovereign that he is exercising but that of a victor and a conqueror. The first duty of a sovereign as sovereign is to secure the welfare of his subjects. This necessitates measures calculated to bring peace and security, and also the punishment of offenders against the peace. And a statesman is judged, not merely on the strength of the measures he undertakes to punish and curb wrong-doers and rebels, but primarily only the positive measures he takes to maintain peace and security.

Sultan Quli, judged from this standard, cannot be pronounced to be a great statesman. Perhaps he had not the time, in spite of his fifty or sixty years of rule, to introduce administrative and ameliorative measures in Telangana. He was compelled to fritter away his energies in conquering and then re-conquering.

But, even if Sultan Quli had the inclination and the means to introduce measures calculated to effect an enduring settlement of Telangana, it is a matter of doubt, however, if he possessed the necessary genius of statesmanship. In this, he was very much in the same position as his illustrious contemporary, Babur, the first of the great Moghals. The one measure that is recorded of him only leaves us confirmed in our judgment about him, a measure which he took in order to prevent sedition and disaffection. Sultan Quli, we are told, on the submission of the troops of Condapilly, "directed that the mutinous troops of Condapilly should be sent to garrison Gunpoora, and those of Gunpoora be marched to Condapilly."³⁹ The garrison at Kondapalli was "chiefly composed of tribe of Hindoos called Naigwaries."⁴⁰

Was this all that Sultan Quli's instinct as statesman could suggest? Then, on this analogy, Telangana could be permanently pacified only by the transplantation of whole populations. The peace of Sultan Quli's kingdom would be left undisturbed and permanently secured only with preponderant majority of a native Muslim population.

In the organisation of the Central Government and the Services, if there existed any, did Sultan Quli evince any evidence of far-reaching statesmanship? He seemed to be dictated by immediate necessities and consideration of his own safety. He seems also to be influenced by a natural partiality for the manners and customs of his own native land. His long sojourn in the Deccan should have taught him the advisability of leaving habits and customs as far as possible untouched. He must also have realised the dangers of party-strife in the State consequent on the rivalry between Deccanis and Pardesis.

For, we are told, by Ferishta, that Sultan Quli "contrary to the practice of India" introduced "the customs of Persia at his Court, among which was that of beating the nobut, or imperial band five times daily "41 If this were all, nothing much might be said about it. The age of Sultan Quli was not particularly an age of faith, and people would not have, on a question of conscience, resisted or resented such measures, however outlandish they may appear to be. But Ferishta tells us something more. Sultan Quli, he tells us, "filled all the offices of the government with his own countrymen" 42

39. Tarkh : Mahomad Qutb Shahi, ibid, p. 368

Perhaps, Sultan Quli was driven to this policy as a measure of safety. But it was not the policy of a statesman whose experience of the Bahmani Sultanate would have taught him a lesson that could never be ignored. Or, perhaps, Sultan Quli could not learn it, and was a victim to the inexorable necessities of his times.

Taken all in all, we must regard Sultan Quli Qutb Shah as one of the great Princes of his age. A soldier of fortune, he rose to the high eminence of sovereignty, and became the founder of a dynasty that ruled over Telangana for nearly two centuries. But, it must be admitted, that he lacked the breadth of vision which would have enabled him to consolidate his conquests by far-sighted statesmanship and to construct a machinery of administration and law based on principles that would have established his rule on the broad and enduring basis of the hearts of a grateful and loving population.

The Qutb Shahi Kings of Golconda

NIZAM COLLEGE, HYDERABAD DN

SULTAN QULI QUTB SHAH came from Persia, during the reign of the Bahmani King Mahmood Shah II and was appointed Governor of Telingana in 1495 A.D. He made Golconda his Capital, repaired its fort, encircled it with walls and bastions and built several palaces. He carried on wars with Telingana and annexed the neighbouring districts. He asserted his independence of the Bahmini suzerainty, after the death of Mahmud Shah II in 1518 A.D. Shitab Khan was the Governor of Warangal who asserted his independence in 1504 but Sultan Quli Qutb Shah recovered it in 1512.

EXTRACT I — Briggs' Translation of Tarikh Mohamad Qutb Shahi pp 360

"Alla-ood-Deen Imad Shah fled to Berar and Sooltan Koolly directed his army to occupy the district of the seven tuppas after which he returned to Golconda. Here he heard that Seetaputty (Shitab Khan), the Raja of Cummamet, had presumed to lay hands on some of the Kootb Shahy districts, which lay contiguous to his country. This Raja possessed the strong forts of Cummamett, Belumconda, Wurungole, and others, and had in his service twelve thousand infantry, noted as good marksman. The King in the first place marched against Belumconda which he closely invested. The siege lasted a considerable time, till at length the King determined to make an attempt to take it by escalade, which he effected by a general assault on all sides at once, in which effort, after losing many men, he at length succeeded.

"When Seetaputty (Shitab Khan) heard of the capture of Belumconda, he immediately marched with an army to oppose the King in the field, who also prepared to receive him. The two armies met, and a battle was fought, wherein the Mohamedans lost many brave officers and soldiers from the well directed fire of the enemy's infantry, which withstood several charges of the Mahomedan cavalry, but they were at length broken, and fled leaving Sooltan Koolly in possession of all the Raja's treasures and heavy baggage, after which the King returned to Golconda.

"Seetaputty (Shitab Khan) subsequent to his defeat, fled to Cummamett, and despatched messages to the neighbouring rajas, such as those of Condapilly, Indraconda, Warapully, and Etgeer, inviting them to form a confederacy against Sooltan Koolly Kootb Shah, who had already reduced the greatest part of Tulingana, and was every day gaining such ground that in a short time no Hindoo chiefs would remain to oppose his ambitious views. The rajas all united accordingly, and formed a rendezvous at Cummamett. When Sooltan Koolly heard of this league, he marched to oppose them, and sanguinary action ensued in the neighbourhood of that place, when the Mahomedans, as usual, gained the victory, and the raja Seetaputty (Shitab Khan) fled, and took protection with Ramchundur Dew. The Mahomedan forces took possession of Condapilly, Indraconda, and Etgeer, while the King proceeded to reduce Cummamett, then one of the strongest forts in Tulingana, but as he was unwilling to spill human blood wantonly, he sent a message to the Commandant of the place, informing him of the defeat of his master, and requiring him to surrender the fort to the Mahomedans, which he refused to do. Several unsuccessful attacks were made in consequence, in which the Mahomedans lost many men; till at length the King resolved, as the last resource, to make a general assault on all sides at once. Sooltan Koolly led the principal attack in person, the Mahomedans, covering their heads with their shields, and being well supplied with scaling ladders, rushed on simultaneously, and although their loss was severe, they succeeded in gaining the ramparts, and drove the garrison before them. On this occasion they gave no quarter, killing every man, woman, and child in the place, excepting the females of the family of Seetaputty (Shitab Khan), who were reserved for the King's seraglio.

"When Seetaputty (Shitab Khan) was defeated, he fled, as before related, to Raja Ramchundur, the son of Gujputty, who held his court at Condapilly, and who was the king of the land and the sea-coast of Tulingana and Orissa, as far as the confines of Bengal. Seetaputty (Shitab Khan) had represented to him that Sooltan Koolly Kootab Shah had, by his persecution, at length succeeded in expelling him from his country, that he had now subdued almost the whole of Tulingana and that his next step would be to invade the country of Ramchundur, which lay contiguous to his own. Gujaputty Ramchundur, convinced of the truth of these observations and relying on the numerous forces he could bring into the field, wrote orders to his adherents to repair with their respective armies to Condapilly where he collected a host of three hundred thousand foot, and thirty thousand horse, all bearing lances, accompanied by Seetaputty (Shitab Khan), Vidiadry, and Hurry Chundur, as well as other rajas of note. These, having sworn to stand by each other, marched to attack Sooltan Koolly. He prepared to oppose them with only five thousand horse and met them at the river near Palunchinoor.

"The Hindoos drew up their forces on the next day in the following order —

"Guja Ramchundur, with ten thousand horse, one hundred thousand foot, and three hundred elephants in the centre."

"On the right, his nephew Vidiadry, with ten thousand horse, one hundred thousand foot, and two hundred elephants."

"On the left, Hurry Chundur, with Seetaputty (Shitab Khan) in the command of ten thousand horse, one hundred thousand foot, and two hundred elephants, the whole of the elephants bearing several men with bows and arrows.

"Sooltan Koolly Kootb Shah, in spite of the disparity of numbers, determined to give the Hindoos battle. He placed his son, Heidur Khan, with fifteen hundred horse, on the right, and Futtehy Khan, with an equal number, on the left, himself taking post in the centre with two thousand horse. According to custom he dismounted in front of the army, and going down on his knees supplicated the great Disposer of events to give up the host of the infidels into the hands of the faithful, after which he mounted, and charged the enemy, driving the affrighted Hindoos before him like sheep. The Raja Ramchundur was taken prisoner and his nephew Vidiadry killed by Prince Heidur Khan's own hand, the capture, also, of all the enemy's elephants and treasure as well as of Raja Ramchundur, ensured to the King the whole of the country as far as the sea-coast. From thence he proceeded to Condapilly, which he reduced, and afterwards went to Ellore and Rajamundry, in the former of which places many Hindoos were slain. Upon the arrival of the Mahomedan forces at Rajamundry they encamped on the banks of the Godavery, where the King received intimation that the enemy had assembled in great numbers in the woods and hills with the intention of attacking him by night. The King accordingly detached his generals, Futtehy Khan and Roostoom Khan, to watch their motions and to endeavour to cut them off. The two parties engaged, and the Hindoos, after they had lost two thousand men, fled to the forest, leaving the Mahomedans in possession of the field of action.

"Vusnad (properly Veja Nat) Dew, commonly called Gujputty, who possessed the countries of Bengal along the sea-coast as far as the confines of Tulingana, hearing of the discomfiture of Raja Ramchundur, sent ambassadors to Sooltan Koolly. A treaty was forthwith concluded, by which it was agreed that the river Godavery should be the boundary between the Mahomedan kingdom of Tulingana and the Hindoo territory of Orissa, after which the seals of the King and Usnad Dew were affixed, and the district of Ellore was made over to the Mahomedans "

Sultan Quli Qutb Shah was put to death in 1543 A.D. and was followed by Jamshed Quli Qutb Shah (1543-1550) and Ibrahim Qutb Shah (1550-1580). Ibrahim Qutb Shah built a small mosque on the steps to Bala Hissar at Golconda. The Hussain Sagar tank was also constructed during his reign. The neighbouring Hindu king of Vijayanagar, Rama Raya gave offence to the kingdoms of Ahmednagar, Bijapur, and Golconda, which resulted in marriage alliances between Golconda and Ahmednagar, and Bijapur and Ahmednagar. Then followed the league of the three sultans and the defeat of Rama Raya in 1564 A.D.,

INTRACI 2 - -Chandorkar, "The Destruction of Vijayanagar" p 171. Quoted by Father Heras in "The Maavidu Dynasty" p 201 foot note

"He (Rama Raya) then went to his own harem, spent some time with Satyabhamabai, the chief Queen, and presented many rich jewels to her. Then he went to another of his wives whose name was Devachintamani Trivegal. Her company gave him great pleasure and he made presents to her. Then he came to the drawing room of his third wife, Mana Mohini Nijaswarapi. She tried to please him in different ways. He ordered sundry fruits from his orchards and presented them to his wives. Then he visited the chamber of his mother Chandrasala. She waved many jewels over his head that evil may be warded off. He then explained to her the state of affairs, how the four kings had made a common cause in attacking him and how the temples, alms distributing houses, and the existence of the Brahmans was threatened. He therefore intimated to her the plan of repulsing and punishing the enemy. He then fell at her feet and asked for her leave. She did not like the idea and said "We have not hurt the Muhammadans, but even then they are all coming united. It would be better to negotiate with them". He, not approving of her advice, went away. Whereupon she consented in order to please him. Afterwards he took rest during the night in his chambers. There he dreamt that somebody was depriving him of his ear jewel and his throne and that he was being pulled down. At once he caused all the astrologers and fortune tellers of long standing to be summoned and related his dream to them. They consoled him by saying that the enemy would be warded off, and that he would be long-lived and rule over his kingdom. He then presented them with costly cloths as well as cocoa-nuts. He also distributed 5,000 huns among the Brahmans "

Mahomed Quli Qutb Shah was the king of Golconda from 1580 to 1611. The dynasty reached its zenith during his reign. He was the founder of the city of Hyderabad. He was very fond of architecture and constructed several buildings.

EXTRACT 3 —Shah Rocco "Golconda and the Qutb Shahs"
Hyderabad 1929, p. 14

"Early in his reign Mahomed Quli became enamoured of a beautiful Hindu dancing girl named Bhagmati, to whom he assigned 1,000 cavalry as an escort. As time passed Golconda became very unhealthy through over population, and in 1591 the king built a magnificent city a few miles away which he named Bhagnagar to commemorate his favourite mistress, Bhagmati. After she died the king was persuaded to change the name of the city to Haiderabad after Haidar, one of the titles of Ali. But the original name remained in use many years for Tavernier and Thevenot, who visited the city half a century later, speak of it as Bhagnagar, and even today the name is used by the commercial community. Bhagmati's Buradari can be seen about a mile south west of the fort.

"In the new city that was laid out on the 'gridiron' principle, there were two important crossing over the main road. At the junction with the road from Golconda Mahomed Quli built the Char Minar in 1593, and at the crossing Masulipatam he erected the Gulzar Hauz. In the same year the Purana Pul or old bridge was built. Mahomed Quli also built the Darus Shifa or hospital, now used to accommodate the Haiderabad Municipality offices, and in 1594 commenced the Ashur Khana, which stands opposite the Salar Jung palace. This building still exhibits a fair amount of fine Persian enamel work. In 1598 the Jami Masjid was erected near the Char Minar. The Darul Mahal or Hall of Justice was built about the same time. Several palaces were erected, e.g., the Chandan Mahal, Hira Mahal, Lakhan Mahal, and the Nadir Mahal, the last probably where the Salar Jung palace stands today. Only the names of these remain. Mahomed Quli's own palace may have stood on the site now occupied by the Purana Haveli.

"Mahomed Quli made extensive additions to the fort of Golconda. It is stated that he spent about £ 300,000 annually on public buildings.

"The Black Rocks near the Hussain Sagar tank were a favourite resort of Mahomed Quli and his successors, who laid out gardens and built pavilions and pleasure houses on the summit. But all traces of these have been eradicated by the ruthless hands of time. In the vernacular the hill is known as the Nanbat Pahar because all official communications from the Mogul Emperors were proclaimed there to the accompaniment of music.

"Just before Ibrahim Quli's death his prime minister built the tank which is known as the Mir Jumla Tank

"It appears that the origin of the interesting Langar procession, which takes place every year in the city on the occasion of the Muharram festival, dates from the time of Mahomed Quli Qutb Shah. Several legends are current, but the following seems to be the favourite. "Soon after Haidarabad was built a Qutb Shah prince was riding to Golconda on an elephant, which suddenly became mast (mad) and carried the prince into the jungle. When the news reached Golconda the prince's mother vowed she would give a certain Fakir a chain of gold as thick as a langan (the foot chain used to tether an elephant) for the safe return of her son. Some hours later the prince arrived unhurt, and the court goldsmiths were set to work on the chain, which was afterwards taken in procession to the fakir's hut." Another version is that the king's favourite elephant became mast and carried off the king for three days.

Mahomed Qutb Shah ascended the throne of Golconda in 1611 and reigned till 1626. During his reign the erection of the Mecca Masjid at Hyderabad was started.

"The erection of this imposing mosque was started by Sultan Muhammad (VI), in 1027 A H (1617 A D) under the supervision of Darogah Mir Faizullah Beg and Chaudhri Rangayyah, alias Hunarmand Khan, with the help of nearly eight thousand masons and labourers. The work of its construction continued during the reigns of Abdullah Qutb Shah (VII) and Tana Shah (VIII), at a cost of eight lacs of rupees and it was completed after 77 years by the Emperor Aurazeb in 1104 A H. When the Emperor was requested for further decoration of the mosque he read this famous couplet

(Transactions of the world have never been completed by any one, (consequently) impose upon yourself as little as possible)

"When the foundation of this mosque was being laid, it is related by all contemporary historians that Sultan Muhammad (VI), after inviting the learned and pious men of the city and asked them to have the foundation stone laid by one who had never missed his prayers, but none from the assemblage having come forward, he himself laid the foundation stone by saying that he had never missed even his 'Tahaj-jud' (a prayer repeated after midnight) ever since his twelfth year. This is one of the most sublime and impressive mosques of the Deccan and it is so extensive that nearly 10,000 men can easily say their prayers conjointly. The building is 225 ft long, 180 ft wide and 75 ft high, the outer enclosure is oblong whose terrace is 360 ft. each way. At a corner of the platform there is a cistern for ablution, with two long slabs measuring 8 ft each, and it is said that these slabs belonged to a temple in Maisrum village, no traces of which are now left. The mosque is composed of triple vestibules measuring (195 x 126' 8") with fifteen arches in each row, and five masonic arches in front, the Northern and Southern extremities are surmounted by two large domes. The two lofty minarets in front, of the main entrance gate and the Sundial of the courtyard, belong to the reign of Aurangzeb. The lofty colonnades and the prayer niche are fashioned out of one stone slab. According to Mons. Tavernier the stone for this niche was hewn out of the quarry by several hundred labourers in the course of five years and 700 pairs of bullocks carried it to the mosque. One of the rooms of the courtyard contains the hair of the prophet and other sacred relics. Sultan Muhammad Qutb Shah (VI), named this mosque by a nickname given to the square temple of Mecca. "In the time of Aurangzeb it assumed the name of 'Mecca Masjid'. It is estimated that the total expenses of this mosque amounted to 3,000,000 lacs of Huns.

"The following verse was composed by a poet and presented to the king in commemoration of its erection.

"If the pilgrimage (going round) of noble Kaaba is not attainable to thee, come and pray in the Kaaba of the Deccan." As regards the adoption of the name of "Mecca Masjid" it is said that Muhammad (VI), had some bricks made from the earth of Mecca which were fixed over the central arch. The compiler of 'Tawarikhe Farkhunda' has given another version, that it being the peculiarity of Kaaba that it is at no time devoid of pilgrims, so is the case with Mecca Masjid that it has never been without those, who come to say their prayers and for this reason the name of Mecca Masjid was spontaneously adopted by the public and became renowned all the world over. During the Qutbshahi period 36 maunds of food was cooked and distributed to the poor every day, but during the reign of Khuld Makan (Aurangzeb) it was reduced to Rs 12/- per diem."

Abdulla Qutb Shah ruled from 1626 to 1627. The French travellers Tavernier and Thevenot visited Golconda during his reign. The English factory at Masulipatam obtained valuable privileges from this king.

"In the early days of Abdulla Qutb Shah's reign his officers appear to have thrown many obstacles in the way of English trade which led to the removal of the English from Masulipatam to Armagon, on the Nellore coast, in 1628. In Masulipatam the English found a half-way mart between the West and the Far East scarcely less lucrative than the Portuguese settlements on the Malabar coast. The factory at Masulipatam turned the eastern flank of the Portuguese in South India as the Surat factory had turned their western flank in North India and the Persian Gulf. The English had to struggle with the Dutch for a footing in Masulipatam but the king of Golconda seems to have realised the advantage of keeping the port open to all comers, for in 1632 the English got from Abdulla Qutb Shah the "Golden Firman" permitting them to reopen their factory at Masulipatam. It contained this assurance: "Under Me the King, they shall sit down at rest and in safety." In return the factory engaged to import Persian horses for the king. The Firman is dated November 1632. It was renewed on the 21st February 1634, and then the importance was recognised of keeping "a continual residence" at Golconda. At any rate, we find that about 30 years later the Company had Mr Cholmly as their agent at Golconda for the purchase of diamonds.

Ibid., p. 19

"Let us forsake Haiderabad politics for a while in company with Tavernier, who visited Golconda on three different occasions before the entire subversion of the kingdom by the Mogul. In the record of his visit in 1645 he gives us an interesting account of Mir Jumla, whom he describes as a man of great wit, understanding and justice. On the occasion of his farewell interview, on the 15th September of that year, he found Mir Jumla seated with two secretaries, bare-footed, "with a large number of papers between his toes and others between the fingers of his left hand, which papers he drew sometimes from between his fingers and sometimes from between his toes and ordered what answers should be given to everyone." With all this correspondence on hand he attended to the salutations of military officers and dealt with four criminals, one of whom had his hands and feet cut off and was thrown on the road to die, because he had broken into a house and murdered woman and her children. Another was disembowelled and thrown on a dung heap for highway robbery. The other two were beheaded for different crimes. It was summary punishment or acquittal in those days: men were never put into prison."

On his first visit in 1642 Tavernier saw a diamond with a merchant at Golconda, which he says, was the largest stone he had seen for sale in India. It was priced at Rs. 5,00,000. Streeter calls it "The Great Table" (it was flat) and devotes a whole chapter to it in his book on the famous diamonds of the world.

Tavernier visited Golconda for the third time in 1652. On that occasion he described the visit of a young Dutch surgeon, Pitrie de Lan, to King Abdulla. "The king summoned this Surgeon and told him that he wished him to bleed him on the following day in four places under the tongue as his physicians had directed, but that he should take care not to draw more than eight ounces. De Lan returning to the Court on the following day, was conducted into a room by two or three eunuchs, and four old women came to conduct him to a bath where, having undressed and washed him well, especially his hands, they annointed him with drugs and aromatics, and in place of his own clothes, which were of European make, they gave him a garment made according to the fashion of the country. They then took him to the king, where they brought basins of gold which the physicians who were present weighed; these were to receive the blood. He then bled the king under the tongue in four places, and he did it so skilfully that, on weighing the blood with the basins he found that he had drawn eight ounces exactly. The king was so satisfied with this operation that he gave him 300 pagodas, which were equal to nearly 700 ecus. The young queen and the queen dowager having heard of it, desired that he would come to bleed them, but I believe it was more from curiosity they had to see him than for any need they had to be bled, for he was a young and well-made man, and probably in their lives they had not seen a stranger close—for from a distance the thing is not impossible, since from the place where they stay they are able to see without being themselves seen. De Lan was then brought into a chamber, where the same women who had taken him to the bath before he had bled the king uncovered his arms, which they washed well, and especially his hands, after which they annointed him with scented oil, as they had done when he went to bleed the king. That being done, they drew a curtain, and the young queen putting out an arm through a hole, the surgeon bled her, and he afterwards did the same for the queen mother. The first bestowed on him 50, and the other 30 pagodas, with some pieces of gold brocade." De Lan was engaged as surgeon on a salary of 800 pagodas, about £ 400, a year.

Tavernier's book gives us some vivid contrasts of the splendour and squalor which abound in Indian cities. We omit the squalor here is his description of Haidarabad, or Bhagnagar as he calls it.

"The town is nearly the size of Orleans, well built and well opened out, and there are many fine large streets in it, but not being paved—any more than are those of all the other towns of Persia and India—they are full of sand and dust, this is very inconvenient in summer.

"Before reaching the bridge you traverse a large suburb called Aurangabad, a Kos in length, where all the merchants, brokers and artisans dwell, and, in general, all the common people, the town being inhabited only by persons of quality, the officers of the King's house, the ministers of justice, and military men. From 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning till 4 or 5 in the evening, the merchants and brokers come into the town to trade with foreign merchants, after which they return home to sleep. There are in these suburbs two or three beautiful mosques, which serve as caravanserais for strangers, and several pagodas are to be seen in the neighbourhood. It is through the same suburb that you go from the town to the fortress of Golconda.

"When you have crossed the bridge you straightway enter a wide street which leads to the King's palace. You see on the right hand the houses of some nobles of the Court, and four or five caravanserais, having two stories, where there are large halls and chambers, which are cool. At the end of this street you find a large square, upon which stands one of the walls of the palace, in the middle of which is a balcony where the King seats himself when he wishes to give audience to the people. The principal door of the palace is not in this square, but in another which is close by, and you enter at first into a large court surrounded by porticoes under which the King's Guards are stationed. From this court you pass to another of the same construction, around which there are several beautiful apartments, with a terraced roof, upon which, as upon those of the quarter of the palace where they keep the elephants, there are beautiful gardens, and such large trees, that it is a matter for astonishment how these arches are able to carry such a weight, and one may say in general terms that this house has all the appearance of a royal mansion.

"When the King administers justice he comes, as I stated into the balcony which overlooks the square and all those who desire to be present stand below, opposite to where he is seated. Between the people and the wall of the palace they plant in the ground three rows of sticks of the length of a short pike, at the ends of which they attach cords which cross one another, and no one is allowed, whosoever he may be to pass these limits without being summoned. This barrier, which is not put up except when the King administers justice, extends the whole length of the square, and opposite the balcony there is an opening to allow those who are summoned to pass through. Then two men, who hold by the ends a cord stretched across this opening, have only to lower it to admit the person who is summoned. A Secretary of State remains in the square below the balcony to receive petitions, and when he has five or six in hand he places them in a bag, which a eunuch, who is on the balcony by the side of the King lowers with a cord and draws up afterwards, in order to present them to His Majesty."

The ceremony of mounting guard is well described. "It is the principal nobles who mount guard every Monday each in his turn, and they are not relieved before the end of a week. There are some of these nobles who command 5,000 or 6,000 horse, and they encamp under their tents around the town. When they mount guard each goes from his home to the rendezvous, but when they leave it they march in good order across the bridge, and from thence by the main street they assemble in the square in front of the balcony. In the van you see ten or twelve elephants marching, more or fewer according to the rank of him who goes off guard. There are some among them bearing cages (howdahs) which somewhat resemble the body of a small coach, and there are others which only carry their driver, and another man instead of the cage, who holds a sort of banner.

"After the elephants, the camels follow two by two, sometimes up to thirty or forty. Each camel has its saddle, upon which they place a small culverin (a long slender gun), which a man, clad in a skin from head to foot, like a sort pantaloons, and seated in the crupper of the camel with a lighted match in hand, quickly turns from side to side before the balcony where the King is.

"You see coming after them the carriages around which the servants walk on foot, after which the led-horses appear and finally the noble to whom this whole equipment belongs, preceded by ten or twelve courtesans, who await him at the end of the bridge, leaping and dancing before him up to the square. After him the cavalry and infantry follow in good order. And as all that affords a spectacle, and has something of pomp about it, during three or four consecutive months which I have sometimes spent at Bhagnagar my lodging being in the main street, I enjoyed the amusement every week of seeing these fine troops passing, which are more or less numerous according to the rank of the noble who has been on guard in his turn.

"The soldiers have for their sole garment but three or four ells of clothes, with which they clothe the middle of the body before and behind. They wear the hair long, and make a great knot of it on the head as women do, having for sole head-dress a scrap of cloth with three corners, one of which rests on the middle of the head, and the other two they tie together on the nape of the neck. They do not have a sabre like the Persians, but they carry a broad sword like the Swiss, with which they both cut and thrust, and they suspend from a belt. The barrels of their muskets are stronger than ours, and the iron is better and purer; this makes them not liable to burst. As for the cavalry, they have bow and arrow, shield and mace, with helmet and a coat of mail, which hangs behind from the helmet over the shoulders."

"Thevenot asserts that the mother of King Abdulla was a Brahmin lady, who had other children by her husband and was very witty, and that it was through her influence that Brahmans were largely employed by the king. He adds that the previous king, Mahomed Qutb Shah, left the crown to his eldest son, but being less beloved of the queen than Abdulla he was imprisoned and Abdulla was placed on the throne. He remained a prisoner until 1656, when he was poisoned because he offered to fight the Moguls during their attack on the fort. Apart from the statement of Thevenot, I have not come across any evidence that Hayat Baksh Begum was a Brahmin lady, but he is fairly accurate and in other matters has been amply corroborated. Hayat Baksh Begum occupies an honourable position in the annals of the Qutb Shah dynasty. We know that she was the daughter of the fifth king Mahomed Quli Qutb Shah, the wife of the sixth king, Mahomed Qutb Shah, and mother of the seventh king, Abdulla Qutb Shah. It is certain, however, that during the reign of her son, when she played a leading part in the affairs of the state, Brahmaas came into power at the court of Golconda and their influence became predominant in the next reign.

"We gather from Thevenot that some of the diamond mines were formed out by the king. People who were allowed to dig in the mines near Masulipatam had to pay the king a pagod (about Rs. 4) for every hour they worked in the mines, whether they found diamonds or not. The king's chief mines are in the Karnatic and he has 6,000 men continually working there, who daily find near 31 lbs. weight and nobody digs there but the king."

Here is Thevenot's description of the jewel which Abdulla Qutb Shah wore in his turban —

"This prince wears on the Crown of his head, a jewel almost a foot long, which is said to be of inestimable value, it is a Rose of great Diamonds, three or four inches diameter, on the top of that rose there is a little crown, out of which issues a Branch fashioned like a Palm-Tree Branch, but it is round, and that Palm-branch (which is crooked at the top) is a good Inch in Diameter, and about half a foot long, it is made of several Springs, which are (as it were) the leaves of it, and each of which have at their end a lovely long Pearl shaped like a Pear, at the foot of this Posee, there are two Bands of Gold in fashion of Table-bracelets, in which are encased large Diamonds set round with Rubies, which with great Pearls that hang dangling on all sides, make an exceedingly rare show; and these Bands have Clasps of Diamonds to fasten the jewel to his head. In short, that King hath many other considerable pieces of great value in his Treasury, and it is not to be doubted, but that he surpasses all the Kings of the Indies in precious stones, and that if there were Merchants (who would give him their worth) he would have prodigious sums of money ”.

“Thevenot has left us a vivid word picture of the pomp displayed by the Omras or nobles of the court. “These Omras generally make a very handsome figure, when they go through the town an elephant or two goes before them on which three men carrying banners are mounted, 50 or 60 troopers well clothed and with bows and arrows, swords at their sides, and bucklers on their backs, follow at some distance, and after those come other men on horseback, sounding trumpets, and playing on fifes. After them comes the Omra on horseback with thirty or forty footmen about him, some making way, others carrying lances and some with fine napkins driving away the flies. One of them holds an umbrella over his master's head, another carries the tobacco pipe, and others pots full of water in hanging cages of canes. The palanquin carried by four men comes next with two porters for change, and all this pomp is brought up by a camel or two with men beating of timbals on their backs. When the Omra pleases, he takes his palanquin, and his horse is led by him. The palanquin is sometimes covered with silver, and its canes or bambous tipped with silver at both ends, the lord is to be seen lying in it, holding flowers in his hand, smoking tobacco, or else chewing belle and areca, shewing by that soft and effeminate posture a most supine dissoluteness. All (who have any considerable pay, whether Moors or Gentiles) imitate the Gentiles, and are carried through the town in palanquins well attended; and the Dutch Interpreter at Bhagnagar (who is a Gentile) goes at present with such an equipage, save only that instead of camels, he hath a chariot, but (at least) there is not a cavalier, but hath his umbrella bearer, his fly-drivers, and his cup-bearer”

Aurangzeb was the Viceroy of the Deccan at the time when Abdulla Qutb Shah was ruling Golconda, and Bernier, another French traveller, gives the following account of Aurangzeb's attempted invasion of Golconda.

BERNIER “Travels in the Mogul Empire”—edited by Constable and Smith, Oxford p. 16.

“During the time that Aurang-Zebe was intrusted with the government of the Deccan the king of Golconda had for his Vizier and general of his armies Emir-Jemla, a Persian by birth, and celebrated throughout Hindostan. The Vizier's lineage was not noble, but his talents were of the first order. he was an accomplished soldier, and deeply versed in business. His wealth was prodigious His political influence, it may readily be imagined, was also very great, commanding as he did not only the armies of the king, but keeping in his own pay a formidable body of troops, with a corps of artillery

"The jealousy of the king of Go'conda was naturally awakened and he eagerly, but silently, sought an opportunity to destroy, or remove from his presence, one whom he regarded as a dangerous rival rather than an obedient subject. Surrounded by persons devoted to the interest of the minister, he felt the prudence of concealing his intentions, but in an unguarded moment, when informed for the first time of the improper intimacy subsisting between Emir-Jemla and the queen-mother, who still retained much beauty, he gave utterance to the feelings by which he had so long been oppressed, and denounced vengeance against this powerful offender.

"The Vizier was at this time in the Karnatic, but, every important office at court being filled by his own and his wife's relations and friends, he was soon made acquainted with the danger which awaited him.....Jemla addressed a letter to Aureng-Zebe, at this time in Daulet-Abad, the metropolis of the Deccan to the following effect

"I have rendered, as all the world knows, essential services to the king of Golconda, and he owes me a heavy debt of gratitude. Nevertheless, he is plotting my ruin and that of my family. May I be permitted, therefore, to throw myself under your protection? In acknowledgement of the kindness I anticipate at your hands I suggest a plan by which you may easily obtain possession both of the King's person and kingdom. Confide in my integrity, and the enterprise will neither be difficult nor dangerous. assemble four or five thousand of your choicest cavalry, and proceed by forced marches towards Golconda, which may be reached in sixteen days, spreading a rumour that this body of horse is escorting an ambassador from Chah-Jehan, who has affairs of moment to negotiate with the king at Bagnaguer.

"The Dabir, through whose medium the first communication is always made to the king, is my relation—my creature—and entirely in my confidence you have only to advance with rapidity and I promise so to order it, that you shall arrive at the gate of Bagnaguer without exciting a suspicion that you are any other than an ambassador from Chah-Jehan. When the king advances, according to custom, to receive the credentials, you may easily secure his person, then his whole family, and dispose of him in the manner you may deem fit, in as much as his palace of Bagnaguer where he usually lives is unwall'd, and without a ditch or fortifications of any sort. Meanwhile I will defray the whole expense of the expedition, and engage to pay fifty thousand rupees daily during the time it may be in progress

"Aureng Zebe, ever intent upon projects of ambition, immediately adopted the measures proposed in this letter. He proceeded at once towards the territory of the king of Golconda and with such address the plot was conducted, that when the prince reached Bagnaguer, no one doubted that this formidable body of horse accompanied an embassy from the Great Mogul. The King, as is usual on similar occasions, repaired to his garden for the purpose of receiving the pretended ambassador with appropriate ceremony and honour, and while unsuspectingly approaching his perfidious enemy, he was about to be seized by ten or twelve slaves, as had been projected, when an Omiah, who was in the conspiracy, touched with sudden remorse and compassion, exclaimed, 'Your majesty is lost if you do not instantly fly, this is Aureng-Zebe, and no ambassador.' It would be superfluous to describe the King's consternation—he fled from the spot, and mounting the first horse he could find, rode at full speed to the fortress of Golconda, distant only a league from Bagnaguer.

"Although disappointed of his prey, Aureng-Zebe felt that there was no occasion for alarm, and that he may securely prosecute his endeavours to obtain possession of the King's person. The entire spoliation of the palace was his next act stripping it of all its costly content. . . . He then determined to besiege the King in his fortress, but as he was without supply of the necessary munitions of war the siege was protracted, and Chah-Jehan, two months after its commencement, peremptorily commanded his son to relinquish his enterprise, and return without delay to the Deccan, so that although the fortress had been reduced to the last extremities from the want of provisions and war material, he was obliged to retire."

The last king of the Qutbshah dynasty was Abul Hasan Tanashah (1672-1687). During the reign of this king, a subsidiary alliance was entered into between Sivaji and Tanashah against Aurangzeb in February, 1677.

EXTRACT 6.—(Translation of "Sabhasad Bakhar"—Sen's "Siva Chhatrapati"—pp 119-124).

Sivaji was in need of money for conquering the Karnatak, and the Sultan of Bhagnagar (Golconda) and an abundance of wealth. "Money could be procured by violence from there but the Sultan used to pay a tribute annually. Cruelty should not be committed there. An interview with him (Sultan) should be obtained by friendly means. The Raja (Sivaji) decided to have the interview arranged, by writing about it to Prahlad Pant who was his envoy at Bhagnagar. Tanashah entertained in his mind a strong suspicion. Then Prahlad Pant assured the Badshah that there was no evil intention and that the Raja would go away after a friendly visit

To this effect was a friendly agreement made with the Raja... . . . The Badshah intended to come forward to a distance to receive him (Sivaji) But the Raja sent the following verbal message with assurances of oaths —

“You should not come You are (my) elder brother, I am (your) younger brother, you should not come forward”.. . . Madanna Pant and Akkanna Pant came forward, received the Raja, and conducted him to the city The Badshah had adorned the whole city. Streets and lanes were all around coloured with a thin layer of kunkum powder and saffron. Festive poles and triumphal arches were erected and flags and standards hoisted in the city. Krors of citizens stood (by the roads) to have a look at the Raja The ladies welcomed him by waving innumerable lamps round him Gold and silver flowers are showered upon the Raja. The Raja distributed much wealth beyond measure and countless dresses among the people in charity and reached the Dad Mahal with all his forces The Badshah came forward and gave (the Raja) a friendly embrace . . . For three hours he listened to the stories of the Raja's heroism Then he presented some ornaments set with jewels, robes, horses, and elephants to the Raja and to all his men and dismissed them The Raja and the Badshah descended from the palace and the Raja went to his quarters..... ..

“After the Raja had left, the Badshah was convinced that he was honest and had respected his oath The next day Madanna Pant took the Raja to his house to be his guest. . . The Badshah summoned Madanna Pant and (they) selected an auspicious moment (and) again brought the Raja for a second interview and gave him innumerable jewels, ornaments inlaid with gems, elephants and horses. Then the two Chhatrapatis sat on the (terrace) of the palace and received the obeisance of all the sarkarkuns and Hambir Raw and other military officers, and ornaments, robes, elephants, and horses were presented to them all, each individually and according to his valour and fame. And the Badshah said, “You should help me on every occasion” After confirming (the alliance) in this manner and taking oaths in the Raja's favour, (the Badshah) gave him leave “I shall regularly pay the stipulated tribute every year, and you should keep in our connection, Prahlad Pant always with me” So suggested the Badshah The Raja returned to his place. After this the principal officers of Bhagnar entertained the Raja as (the) guest. In this manner he spent a month at Bhagnagar With the treasures and provisions of that place he led his army towards Jangi”

The kingdom of Golconda came to an end in the year 1687 and Golconda was captured by the Mughals Bernier gives an account of the condition of Golconda under Abul Hasan. Sarkar, in his “History of Aurangzeb gives a detailed account of the siege.

EXTRACT, 7.—Bernier's Travels, p. 195.

"I shall advert to five or six facts that prove the low state of degradation to which this wretched King is reduced

First—When I was at Golconda, in the year 1667, an ambassador extraordinary arrived from Aureng-Zebe, for the purpose of declaring war, unless the King supplied the Mogol with ten thousand cavalry to act against Visapour. This force was not indeed granted, but what pleased Aureng-Zebe still better, as much money was given as is considered sufficient for the maintenance of such a body of cavalry. The King paid extravagant honours to this ambassador and loaded him with valuable presents, both for himself and the Mogol, his master

Second—Aureng-Zebe's ordinary ambassador at the court of Golconda issues his commands, grants passports, menaces and ill-treats the people, and in short, speaks and acts with the uncontrolled authority of an absolute sovereign.

Third—Emir-Jemla's son, Mahmet-Emir-Kan although nothing than one of Aureng-Zebe's Omrahs, is so much respected in Golconda, and chiefly in Masulipatam that the taptapa, his agent or broker, virtually acts as master of the port. He buys and sells, admits and clears out cargoes, free of every impost and without any person's intervention. So boundless was the father's influence formerly in this country, that it has descended to the son as a matter of right or necessity

Fourth—Sometimes the Dutch presume to lay an embargo on all the Golconda merchant-vessels in the port, nor will they suffer them to depart until the King comply with their demands. I have known them even protest against the King because the Governor of Masulipatam, prevented them from taking forcible possession of an English ship in the port, by arming the whole population, threatening to burn the Dutch factory, and to put all these insolent foreigners to the sword

Fifth—Another symptom of decay in this kingdom is the debased state of the current coin, which is extremely prejudicial to the commerce of the country

Sixth—A sixth instance I would adduce of the fallen power of the King of Golconda is, that the Portugueses, wretched, poor, and despised as they are become, scruple not to menace him with war, and with the capture and pillage of Masulipatam and other towns if he refuses to cede San Thome, a place which these same Portugueses, a few years ago, voluntarily resigned into his hands to avoid the disgrace of yielding it to the superior power of the Dutch"

J. SARKAR—"History of Aurangzib", Vol IV p 382.

"In time the rain ceased, the roads became dry and the rivers fordable again, provisions began to come to the Mughal camp, and the famished troops got a new life. On 21st September, after the siege had lasted nearly eight months, "the luck of Aurangzib did its work, without a stroke of sword or spear" Golconda was captured by bribery

"An Afghan soldier of fortune, named Abdulla Pani, sur named Sardar Khan, had deserted Bijapur service for the Mughal and then left the Mughals to join Abul Hasan, and now in the decline of the Qutb shahi monarchy he had risen to be one of the two highest officers in the fort. This double eyed traitor now sold his master to the enemy . . .

"But it was not to be won without a final struggle. One last feast of the purest heroism cast its radiance on the fall of Golconda and redeemed its infamy. When the exultant Mughals were swarming into the fort and making their way to the palace, a single rider who had no time to gird his belt or put saddle on his horse's back, fell like a lunatic on that myriad of enemies. It was Abdur Razzaq Lari, surnamed Mustafa Khan, the one faithful man rejected with scorn all the bribes of Aurangzib, including a Command of Six Thousand Cavalry in the Mughal army, saying that "he would rather be ranked among the 72 faithful companions who perished with Khalif Hassan at Karbala than with the 22,000 traitors who overcame him". Alone he rushed against the flood of invaders, shouting, "While I live, there will be at least one life sacrificed in defence of Abul Hasan". He forced his way against 'a thousand swords' to the gate of Bala Hissar. But covered with 70 distinct wounds, one eye badly damaged, and the skin of his forehead slashed and hanging down so as to obstruct his vision, his horse reeling from wounds and loss of blood,—Abdur Razzaq no longer saw his path before, but did his best merely to keep his seat and gave his horse the loose rein. The animal escaped from the press and dropped him near an old coconut tree in the Nagina Bagh garden near the citadel. Here the only hero of the siege of Golconda lay blood-stained, insensible, half dead, for an entire day, and was then found out and taken to his home. Thence he was removed to the Mughal camp and nursed back to life by order of the Emperor"

The Rise and Decline of the City of Aurangabad

BY

MR. GHULAM AHMAD KHAN, EX-SUBEDAR, AURANGABAD

I SHALL describe to you briefly the growth and the decay of the city of Aurangabad, which, in the XVII century was the largest city in the East—it was as large as what modern Calcutta to-day is!

The Biblical Expression Ichabod

“The glory has departed” truly applies to this city.

It is not possible to describe the history of the Deccan without mentioning the important events that were happening in the North

To get therefore a proper perspective of the events that led to the foundation of the city of Aurangabad we have to pick up our thread of narration from the fourteenth century. How this Bahmini kingdom was established by a peasant is of interest for our Dominions as its past glory is still to be seen in the ruined cities of Gulbarga and Bidar

It quickly rose to an extraordinary height of prosperity under this Sultan. Amongst the Mohamedans, more than any other people there are to be found instances of a romantic and adventurous life, but even amongst Mohamedans there are but few examples of such a wonderful change of fortune and still rarer are the instances where the success was unstained by cruelty. Simultaneously, further South, the fallen kingdom of Warangal had given rise to the establishment of another Empire with its seat at the banks of the River Tungabhadra, in 1336. It is said that two brothers, the scion of the fallen kingdom of Warangal were helped by a Scholarly Brahman, known as Vidya Aranya, the forest of the learning—the correct name of this city is said to be Vidya and not Viya-Nagaram.

The Bahmini kings were waging war, for over a century, with Vijayanagar, which extended from the mouths of the River to C. Comorin and from Goa to Masulipatam

The bone of contention was our Raichur. The great Bahmini kingdom dis-integrated after a glory of about a century and a half giving rise to 5 separate principalities, BIJAPUR, GOLCONDA, AHMEDNAGAR, BIDAR AND BERAR

At this time there was a change of dynasty at Vijayanagar and the newly founded kingdoms, taking advantage of this made the famous quadruple alliance, Berar being excluded, and fought the decisive battle of TALIKOTAH in 1565 obliterating the Empire from the political map of India.

Emperor Akbar who was ruling at Delhi, now had his longed for opportunity to fulfil his ambition to bring the country South of Narbada under his rule. Burhanpur, the capital of Khandesh, the threshold of the Deccan, was taken as early as 1562. The kingdom of Ahmednagar for its geographical position, was next assailed.

It is a strange incidence that in the Deccan contemporary of Queen Elizabeth, was a woman of equal ability and political talent, Chand Bibi, who ruled over Ahmednagar a realm as large as England.

The first Mughal campaign at Ahmednagar began in 1565 in the time of Akbar. The famous Chand Bibi, the aunt of the minor king was the life and soul of a vigorous and heroic defence but she was murdered by one of her factions eunuchs and became the heroine of the Romance "A NOBLE QUEEN" by Col Meadows Taylor.

Fall of Ahmednagar led directly to the foundation of the city of Aurangabad. Malik Ambar the talented and industrious minister restored the fallen dynasty proclaiming the young prince as king and himself as his minister and viceroy at Daulatabad. The coronation took place at Parenda (Osmanabad Dist).

Malik Amber originally an Abyssinian slave, and Christian by birth, was brought up by a Muslim family and had risen to a high position during the time of Queen Chand and was her deputy.

It was in 1605 that he started building the city of Aurangabad. In English History this was the memorable year of the GUN POWDER PLOT, to blow up king James and the Lords and commons.

When the unfortunate King Charles I was ruling England without a parliament this city was growing in its glory.

The name of the village on which the new city of Aurangabad was built was Khirkee—or the Rockies. An old temple still exists, called, Khirkeshwar, to perpetuate the antiquity of this city. The geographical position of the site was favourable for an abundant water supply being situated in a valley of about 10 miles through which flows a perennial stream, known as Kham River which flows through the city separating the civil area from that of the Cantonment. Malik Amber named the city FATEHNAGAR, after his son.

In the course of 10 years the new capital became a populous and imposing city. Malik Amber is as famous in the history of the Deccan as is Raja Todar Mall of Northern India for his revenue reforms. One remarkable feature of the spirit of religious toleration of Malik Amber is that he had distinguished men of different denominations round him. It is an interesting fact that the great Maratha power, which practically wrested the Government from the Mughal Emperors, had its nurture in the city of Aurangabad. Maloji, grand-father of Shivaji, till his death, in 1619, was a great favourite of Malik Amber and so was his son Shivaji. Maloji had two sons, one he called Shahji and the other Sharifi, after the Saint Shah Sharif. This shows to what extent religious toleration existed and what change came later.

Malik Amber built many mosques and a Christian Church is also attributed to him, of which only one solitary wall exists now.

He built the Naukhandia Palace, now in ruins which consisted of 5 Zanana buildings, a Diwani-Am, a Diwani-Khas, vast gardens and cistern and a number of baths. This place was later occupied by Asaf Jah, the founder of the dynasty of H. E. H. the Nizam by Government Officials places Nazar (token gift) on certain state occasions.

The Jame Masjid, which began to be erected in his time, has fifty polygonal pillars.

This imposing building, now in a disapidated condition commonly known as "Cheeta Khana", was erected by him as a meeting place for pandits and learned men of the city. But it has since fallen on evil days. During the reign of Aurangzeb it was relegated to the use of travellers as a Rest House and later the Imperial hunting cheetas and falcons were housed there. In recent times it was used as gaol and till lately was the Municipal Office of the city. It has now been repaired and restored to its previous dignified position of being used as a Town Hall.

The present city road runs through a large square stone gateway called Bharkal, which means in old Deccani Urdu, a large door, the erection of which is also attributed to Malik Amber. The most remarkable of his works for which his name, even to the present day, is a household word, is the ingenious system of water supply that he gave to the city. A canal, taken from a river about five miles from the city, consists of a series of aqueducts with ventilating shafts of masonry. It has been serving the needs of the city even to the present day, by the simple process of gravitation, since its construction in about 1616.

This system retaining all its ancient features, has now been modernised, the filters, service reservoir and distribution system having been designed on new lines.

It is said that the population of the city was about two hundred thousand during the time when Malik Amber was at the zenith of his power. He had the misfortune of seeing his city ransacked and plundered by the troops of Shah Jehan in 1621, and it was then thought that the city would not recoupe even in twenty years. But such was the energy of this remarkable personality and such the prosperity of the country that within a short period the city regained its lost splendour and at the time of his death in 1626 it was still the cynosure of the Mughal Empire.

Slowly and steadily the Marathas gained influence and power in the politics of the Deccan, about the commencement of the 17th century, so much so that the nominal Mahomedan rulers of kingdom of the Deccan were virtually controlled, both in civil and military departments by Maratha statesmen and warriors. Malik Amber also allowed them to rally round him. Mughal army, taking advantage of the death of Malik Amber, was tempted to attack the city again in the same year but did not succeed. In 1633, however, Fatehnagar, with the rest of the Nizam Shahi territory, fell to the Mughals and Aurangzeb, during the period of his second viceroyalty of the Deccan, made it his capital in 1653, and called it Aurangabad. After the great war of succession of Indian History, Aurangzeb ascended the throne of Delhi in 1658, exactly two hundred years before another epoch-making change came over India.

During the earlier part of his reign the Marathas became a real menace to the Empire.

In 1682 they assembled in the neighbourhood of the Satara Hills, three miles to the North to attack the city of Aurangabad but retired, hearing of the arrival of a vast army of the Mughals. A wall round the city was erected by order of the Emperor in the following years.

The four principal entrances face the cardinal points, the most important being the northern one called the Delhi gate. All big cities in the South at that time had their main gates invariably facing in this direction. Even the principal gate of the Peshwa's palace at Poona is called the Delhi gate.

The most important of the buildings of the Mughals period is the Mukbera, built by Azam Shah, son of Aurangzeb, in memory of his mother Rabia-Daurani, between the year 1650 and 1657—a very handsome building by itself, but a poor imitation of the great Taj at Agra. The marble used in the Mukbera was brought from Jeypur and the traveller Tavernier mentions having met carts, laden with them, proceeding from Upper India to Aurangabad. He wrote as follows —

“Going one time from Surat to Golconda, I met in five days' journey from Aurangabad, more than three hundred wagons laden with this marble, the least where of was drawn by twelve oxen”

URK in Turkish means citadel, the same as ARX in Latin, or the English ARK

This palace was built by Aurangzeb and is a magnificent group of buildings, where Aurangzeb lived. It comprises of beautiful halls for the Zanana and baths and cisterns and is a typical lay-out of the Mughal gardens

The window where he appeared every morning and received the homage of his people, as the greatest Emperor of his time, is still intact, and so is his kitchen

The prayer hall in which he used to transcribe Koran and stitch caps, on the proceeds of which he lived a spartan life, has now been turned into a mosque

In the same compound is to be found an interesting building known as the “Palmer Kotie” here the first bank of that name was established to pay up the arrears of the pay of the army in the first quarter of the last century.

It is said that General Bussy also lived in that house, while Salabat Jung, under his control, lived in the palace in the interior. Salabat Jung was declared the Nizam by the French in 1751. He and Bussy advanced from Hyderabad to Aurangabad which they reached in June 1752 ORME says “The entry into Aurangabad was more splendid and magnificent than that which had been made at Golconda. The inhabitants of the city of Aurangabad, when the suba is there, are computed at a million and a half souls.

One of the most picturesque sites in India and the pride of Aurangabad, is the shrine Panchaki (the water mill), where Baba Musafar, the spiritual guide of Aurangzeb is buried. The garden walls descend down to the bed of the river that flows by its side and the water fall, in a beautiful broad sheet, is the special feature of the place. No less an authority than Mr. Gladston Solomon, Director, of the School of Arts, Bombay, has stated his opinion about this in the following words —

“I regard it as one of the most attractive gardens I have ever seen in the East. Within a comparatively small area, it comprises all the fascination of an exquisite setting conjoined to most interesting historical buildings and sanctuaries. Its tanks are unique for their beautiful lay-out and charming relation to their surroundings. The remarkable hall under the tank is unique in my experience of Indian Gardens, and the little bower that looks across the smallest of the tanks towards the mosque, is perfection from the artist's point of view, offering remarkable views of sketching, I could say, a good deal more if time had served."

Aurangzed died in 1707 at Ahmednagar and was buried at Khuldabad. After his death, war broke out amongst his sons and there was chaos at Delhi. Nizamul-Mulk, Fateh Jung, the founder of the present ruling dynasty of Hyderabad transferred his capital from Aurangabad to the city of Hyderabad in 1727.

The important buildings constructed in the city of Aurangabad after the death of Aurangzeb are Shah Ganj Mosque and Baradari of Ewaz Khan, in which are located the offices of the Subedar and the Talukdar. Damri Mahal, now in a state of complete disrepair, was constructed, it is said, from the Savings of the wages of the labourers.

From the above short resume, it will be seen that this city from a small village on a barren sheet rock rose to the eminence of the largest city in the East with a population of about a million and a half. During its ephemeral existence of about a century and a quarter it was practically for half a century the capital of the last functioning Emperor of Hindustan. Its population now, including that of the Cantonment is about 37,000. What Omar Khayam said is truly applicable to this —

They say the lion and the lizzard keep
The courts where Jamshed gloried and drank deep Bahram, the great Hunter—the wildness
Stamps over his head but never breaks his sleep

The City of Worangal in the 15th Century as gleamed from Telugu Poetical Works

R. SUBBA RAO, PROFESSOR OSMANIA UNIVERSITY

KRIDABHIRAMAM is a very interesting drama of the Veedhi type in the Telugu literature and it reflects the condition of Warangal in the 15th century. The title of the play itself means a lovely play and it is justified by persuing its contents. Telugu dramaturgy classified plays under 10 catagories. The Veedhi type is simple with only one or two characters who generally soliloquise and if at all converse or hold a dialogue the presence of the other party is generally presumed. The prevading sentiment is of course love.

The authorship of the play has not yet been attributed indisputably to one person. The controversy is between Vallabhamatya and Sri Nadha. Majority of scholars ascribe the work to Vallabha. There is a long genealogy of the author which is given at the beginning. But the style of the play smacks of the authorship of Sri Nadha who wrote ornate, pedantic but perfectly grammatical Telugu. Sri Nadha was a great master in portraying lovely female characters and that trait is highly pronounced in the play. Sri Nadha was the leading literary genius of his age but he has not made a mention of this play in the inventory of his works. Even the explanation that Sri Nadha wrote the drama under the name of Vallabha does not appeal to common sense unless a cogent reason is discovered for it.

After the introductory portion in which the family history of the author is stated we have the first verse addressed to a bee, expressing a surprise as to how it has left the musical atmosphere of gardens where flowers and fruits overflow with palatable juices. This is to imply that an atmosphere of wine woman and violin is to permeate the play. The bee is symbolic of a licentious young man.

A Brahmin youth, who was resourceful and brainy but did not have any money, once went to Warangal and fell in love with a damsel who was already married. The adventurous beauty also must have been moved by the cleverness of the young fellow that is why she even married the Brahmin. But the wedded life could not be felicitous for a long time because the Brahmin was not able to acquire money for material comfort. The Brahmin left the place with a desire to make some arrangements for getting an inexhaustible fund of money and met a merchant youth whom he befriended. The name of the Brahmin was Manchana, the name of the damsel was Kama Manjari and the name of the merchant was Tittibha Chetti. Manchana charmed Tittibha Chetti by his fascinating manners and the narration of his lovely experiences with Kama Manjari. The impressionable Chetti was persuaded by Manchana to go on a journey to the great capital of Warangal. Tittibha who was a wealthy person really needed an expert who could initiate him into the haunts of pleasure. To the highest satisfaction of Manchana the plan became ripe and Tittibha agreed to go to Warangal on a pleasure trip. Then the two youths approach the rampart of the fort of Warangal and then follows a graphic descriptions of various persons met with and scenes witnessed.

In the vicinity of the rampart they come across a Medara woman, seated on a bamboo stool, then an out-caste woman just from a bath in the ditch, the third person that greeted their eyes was a Karnata woman with a pitcher under her arm. The sight of these lovely women, scantily dressed, must have inspired hope in their mind to discover more sensuous things within. Later they enter the main gate of the fort and come to the Myla Santa or unclean market. Here they met a boy vendor with an ivory box containing red pills and hawking it as Susarabhet. It was a novelty to the visitors to Warangal so they stopped the boy and enquired as to what it was. The hawker surprised at the stupidity of Manchana and Tittibha told they were depilatory pills much in demand by the women of the town. Further they entered the cultivators' hamlet, and saw some rustic damsels putting decorated cow-dung balls in front of their houses. The glowing unadorned faces of the ladies delighted the youngsters. Then they saw a Kamata woman i.e., a dancing girl with red saree, a plaited hair and some three-row-necklace round her neck. Her charming person stimulated some rhapsodical flashes from Manchana and they had to cut themselves away forcibly from the matchless beauty. Manchana and Tittibha then enter the court reserved for gamblers. The poet has given a realistic and graphic picture of the game. How hoping against hope they stake what ever they have and even lose that. Their joyous faces before the result is learnt and the ghastly disappointment represented on the face later are all depicted with a great mastery. Manchana who was already a victim to one vice did not like to devote himself to the other. He even cursed those fellows. There they met a beautiful Telu woman who was selling the scented chameli oil. She was a 'Veersaiva' woman bedecked with prominent ornaments and a silver 'Linga' suspended from her neck. Her voice had also an enticing charm.

After going a few steps further they noticed an oil (mill) press, with a robust lady seated on the yoke, merrily singing and guiding the ox with a whip

The next scene of attraction then was the row of tailors. Here too they witnessed many ladies who had come to the tailors either to carry away the jackets and the bodices completed by the tailors or to place orders for new clothes. The tailors were to take the measurements of their bodies. Manchana and Tittibha saw a clever tailor who had apparently put on a silly appearance and was measuring and remeasuring the chest and the back of a damsel and going wrong in the final calculation of the cloth required. They must have vied with the lot of such fellows. Next they saw a household lady preparing paste out of turmeric. Whiling their time on the main road with the sight of such pleasant scenes, they entered one more gate and came to the Royal road which was very much crowded. Elephants, chariots and horsemen frequently passed over this street. The road gave a representative picture of the aggrandizement of the capital. Manchana said to Tittibha that they should wend into cross roads or some by lanes so they could have views of the residences of the dancing girls.

The new comers then saw and heard some dancing and music in a Paluad Temple. The girl who danced and sang displayed such a vigour and talent in her performance that the on lookers were extremely enthused and inspired to imitate some of those blood curdling events. The poet displays here powers over poetic phraseology and rouses the sentiments to a high pitch of exuberance. The walls of the temple bore mural paintings illustrating the theme described. Then they stay for some time in the temple of the Eka Virā Devi.

Then they heard the recitation of a jakkula maid singing Kameshwari's love. This song is extremely popular amongst the Telugu speaking people. They then witness the performance of mylare heroes. Frightful acts of religious frenzy committed by the adherents of the various cults are represented. Amongst the miscellaneous items there was a maiden in a bow-posture on her back, her nose-screw was thrown in a tub and she was lifting it out of water by her nose. The damsel was also putting a handful of black beads into a thread by means of her tongue. Manchana and Tittibha were ravished by the cleverness of the performer. They then come to a group of temples, that of Keshava Swayambhoo, the family deity of the Kakatiyas, was surmounted by golden domes and turrets. Then there were the temples of Bhairawa, Chamandeshwari, Virabhadreshwara and the Buddhistic monastery, a choultry and a mosque for the Muhammadans. By this it was noon and the clock on the tower opposite to the palace struck ¹²

Naturally a hotel attracted the attention of the visitors. The manager blatantly asked them whether the young men were enquiring rates for food and bed both or for food alone. The terms were settled for luncheon alone. It consisted of delicious courses principal of which was camphor-rice. Resting a while after food these youthful adventurers started on their sojourn.

When they started again, they met a female florist who had ketaki flowers. She discerned the young men and guided at them offering her flowers for sale to them. In Andhra Desha, the institution of Pusupa Lavikas was a common sine qua non of a fashionable town. The flower gatherers plied their trade here very cleverly. They sold their wreaths garlands and nosegays in the west-end of the towns. These vendors especially women were very adept as conversationalists particularly in silly sallying. Some passages describing the virtues of Kevada flower are unique in Telugu literature.

Thence they moved to a magnificent mansion, the yard in front of which was besprinkled with scented water and saffron powder. The whole facade was decorated with a remarkable taste. Struck by the imposing sight of the building, he enquired as to whose it was. Manchana was pook-pooked for not knowing the divine name of the blessed person who lived in and owned the building. It was the edifice in which lived Machala Devi, the famous dancing girl and the enchanting conversationalist of the Kakatiya court of Pratab Rudra. A new picture gallery was set up there and it was turned into some thing like a museum. Its inaugural was to take place on the same day. They were told they could step in and have a look at the exhibition. They craved nothing more. Brahmins were reciting certain psalms and mantras invoking the divine aid at the inaugural. They could also see the centre of attraction and beauty, Machala Devi seated on a cushioned mattress, stuffed with swan feathers. The Devi returned the bow, rising a little when the rich ornaments ginkled and asked them as to who they were etc, and asked them to have a look at the paintings. The poet exploits this occasion for giving description of various paintings in which only love themes from the Puranas were depicted. The pieces of art seem to be first rate and drawn with mastery.

Leaving this place they enter into another mansion belonging to another dancing girl, where the ceremony of looking into the mirror was in full swing, the day being particularly auspicious. Manchala did not seem to be a stranger to the place and he was being urged to give a suitable present on the occasion. The next scene was a mela of Kalaswamy where such frolics were in progress that they were losing their religious character. There were hosts of widows. Then they heard the music of Nageswaram and were swayed by its rapturous tides of melody. They see the performance of a snake charmed and hear the music of his pipe. Then they witnessed cock-fight and ram-fight. The Andhras have always taken a keen interest in these fights. They select the animals feed them sumptuously and train them cleverly. These combatants fight like heroes and when discomfited die like bleeding warriors.

Does the play suggest that vigour, valour and virtue were disappearing from the Kakatiya regime? The Dramatist had to describe one soft and sensuous scene after the other.

Some Unpublished Muslim Inscriptions from Sholapur

BY

DR. ABDULLAH CHUGHTAI, (POONA).

SHOLAPUR is one of the important districts of the Bombay Presidency. Its head quarters of the same name has a Railway Junction Station on the G. I P Railway line between Madras and Bombay. It is between $17^{\circ} 10'$ and $18^{\circ} 32'$ north latitude and $74^{\circ} 42'$ and $76^{\circ} 15'$ east longitude and it has an area of 5421 square miles.

It is adjacent to Ahmadnagar in the north, Nizam's Dominions on the east, district of Bijapur on the south and Poona, Satara and some of the Deccan states on the west.

The town of Sholapur though a long since known as such has found mention by a variety of slightly different names in a number of old writings and inscriptions described hereunder. Raghvanka, the author of Sanskrit work called Siddharamapurana as life of one Siddharama mentions him as an inhabitant of Sunnalapur which is believed to be the same place as our present day Sholapur. The famous writer Firishta describing the meeting of Burhan Nizam Shah of Ahmadnagar (A.H. 914-961/A.D. 1508-53) with Isma'il Adil Shah (A.H. 916-41/A.D. 1510-34) at Sholapur in A.H. 920/A.D. 1516 states in passing that the old name of this town was Sadlapur. The Burhan-i Maathirs in narrating the transfer of Sholapur from Khwja Jahan commander of Parenda fort in Ahmadnagar territory to Kamal Khan, the general of Isma'il Adil Shah in A.H. 906/A.D. 1500, refers to this place by the name of Sundalapur. But at another place in the same work Sholapur has been referred to as Salapur. Apart from these writers we find that the three Persian inscriptions and one Marathi inscription still extant on the bastions and walls of the fort of Sholapur mention this town by the name of Sundalapur but two other Persian records also found in the same fort speak of this town as Sholapur. Despite the fact remains that the name Sholapur holds the field to this day.

It is unfortunately not possible at this stage of current researches to trace the annals of Sholapur to the beginnings of its origin and early growth. Judged, however, by the orthodox standard of modern historical investigation authentic historicity of Sholapur may well be said to begin only from the last quarter of the fourteenth century of the Christian era, when this town as part of the Gulbarga Province of the Bahamani Sultanate was first provided with a massive and extensive fort of its own by the reigning Bahamani Sultan.

The site and structure of this very Muslim fort, however, presents us with a vast variety of shattered pillars and lintels as well as mutilated images and highly ornamented cult-objects of unmistakable Hindu religious inspiration which were used by the Muslims in the masonry of the walls of this stronghold and are still easily discernible. There is also a complete Hindu temple that has recently been unearthed in its open area within the walls. Moreover, the only one mosque in the fort is, no doubt, a converted Hindu temple. Though of small dimensions, it is a fine specimen of Hindu architecture generally found in the Deccan belonging to the 13th and the 14th centuries. Similar mosques, being converted Hindu temples, can also be seen in other places like Bijapur, Poona, etc.

All this goes to show that before its occupation by the Muslims during the fourteenth century of the Christian era, the town of Sholapur was in all probability a place of some religious importance probably all through the time of the various Hindu dynasties before the coming of the Muslims, such as the Devagiri Yadwas in the beginning of the 14th century, the Kalachuris (1157-1183), Chalukyas of Kalyani (973-1190), Rashtrakuts (753-973), the Eastern Chalukyas (615-1118) and the Early Chalukas (550-753).

For the purposes of an historical introduction to a paper of the nature that I am reading before you, it would be enough to attempt to review the more notable events witnessed by Sholapur from the time, the rays of authentic history are seen clearly to shed light on its fortunes. That time as already hinted at above was the close of the fourteenth century when this town was raised to the status of a fort town in the Bahamani empire. In 1314, during the reign of Alau'd-Din Shah Bahamani II (A.H. 838-62/A.D. 1434-57), his younger brother named Muhammad in collusion with king of Vijayanagara raised the standard of revolt and made Sholapur and country round it as the base of his rebellious operations. This revolt proved short lived and Sholapur was re-occupied by the Sultan's army.

After the dismemberment of the Bahamani empire between 1498 and 1527 into five independent kingdoms viz. Nizam Shahi of Ahmadnagar in 1490, Barid Shahi of Bidar in 1487, Adil Shahi of Bijapur in 1490, Imad Shahi of Berar in 1490 and Qutb Shahi of Golconda in 1518, Sholapur figures as a bone of ceaseless contention and clash between rulers of Ahmadnagar and Bijapur particularly. At first it was annexed to his kingdom by Yusuf Adil Shah of Bijapur. After his death in 1510 the king of Ahmadnagar taking advantage of the minority of Isma'il Adil Shah, the king of Bijapur, suddenly occupied the Sholapur Fort and tract. Kamal Khan, the regent and guardian of the minor Isma'il Adil Shah, however, lost no time in retaking it from Zain Khan the Ahmadnagar commander in 1511.

In A H 930/A D 1524 Isma'il Adil Shah sent one of his nobles Sayyid Ahmad Hirvi to Burhan Nizam Shah to bring about lasting friendship between the two kings. Hirvi was introduced to Burhan Nizam Shah by the latter's astute minister Shah Tahiri. At this meeting an interview was arranged to take place between the kings of Bijapur and Ahmadnagar at Sholapur. On this occasion Burhan Nizam Shah sought the hand of Maryam, a sister of Isma'il Adil Shah. This request met with success and the marriage ceremony took place at Sholapur during the whole month of Rajab.

It is said that on this occasion Isma'il Adil Shah promised to give the fort and tract of Sholapur as marriage portion of this sister. The promise was not fulfilled in time and next year with the co-operation of Imad Shah of Berar and Amir Barid' the regent of Bidar, Burhan Shah marched with forty thousand strong to besiege Sholapur. Isma'il Adil Shah on the other side came with ten thousand foreign cavalry to oppose the invader. Both the armies remained encamped forty days between the forts of Sholapur and Naldurg at a distance of four miles from each other without coming to a decisive clash. This mild affair, however, ended in favour of Isma'il Adil Shah, who retained possession of Sholapur. Four years later i.e., A.H. 935/A D. 1528 Burhan Nizam Shah invaded the territories of Adil Shah but met with the same fate as before this time at the hands of the noted Bijapur general Asad Khan.

After the lapse of nine years when Ibrahim Adil Shah I (A.H. 941-65/A D 1534-57) was on the throne of Bijapur a serious misunderstanding arose between him and his Shia' general Asad Khan who was suspected by his sovereign of complicity and secret collusion with Burhan Nizam Shah of Ahmadnagar, who too was a staunch Shia by faith. Although Ibrahim Adil Shah and Asad Khan were soon reconciled Burhan Nizam Shah with the help of Amir Barid invaded the kingdom of Ibrahim Adil Shah in A.H. 949/A D 1542 and this time succeeded in wresting the Sholapur fort and tract. Ibrahim Adil Shah thus defeated, went with his family to Gulbarga while his army marched back to Bijapur. Burhan Nizam Shah is said to have entrusted the control of Sholapur fort to one of his nobles and have led his forces further towards Bijapur. Meanwhile, Ibrahim Adil Shah had won over Imad Shah of Berar to his side and with his support managed to repel the advance of Burhan who was obliged to escape with his army towards Doulatabad. In this retreat Amir Barid, the only confederate left to Burhan died suddenly and this bereavement obliged Burhan Nizam Shah to sue for peace. Shah Tahir, his minister, was sent to negotiate the terms. In the treaty it was agreed that Sholapur and its tract should be restored to Ibrahim Adil Shah and that Burhan Nizam Shah should never again claim to it. After this episode relations between the Ahmadnagar and Bijapur monarchs continued cordial and cool for some time.

In A H 950/A D 1543 Ibrahim Adil Shah married a daughter of Alau'd-Din Imam Shah of Berar. This union unfortunately soon bred sharp disagreement between Ibrahim Adil Shah and his father-in-law. Taking advantage of this estrangement Burhan Nizam Shah formed a secret alliance with Rama Raja of Vijayanagar and Jamshid Quli of Golconda to attack Bijapur in full force. Ibrahim Adil Shah on this occasion found it advisable to peacefully hand over Sholapur fort and the county round to it Nizam Shah. Not long after, however, Burhan Nizam Shah at the instigation of Rama Raja of Vijayanagar made a sudden attack on Gulbarga to defend which Ibrahim Adil Shah had to advance from Bijapur. Although Ibrahim Adil Shah fought with the greatest valour, he failed to rescue Gulbarga from the more powerful grip of Burhan.

After the death of Burhan Nizam Shah in A.H. 961/A D 1553 peace was concluded between his successor Husain Nizam Shah and Ibrahim Adil Shah. This peace did not last long for the reason that Prince Ali son of Burhan Nizam Shah having deserted his brother took refuge at the court of Ibrahim Adil Shah where it was resolved that Ali Nizam Shah should be helped to unseat his brother from the throne of Ahmadnagar in return for which help the forts of Kalyani and Sholapur should be restored by Ali Nizam to the king of Bijapur. In pursuit of this resolve Ibrahim Adil Shah marched from Bijapur to support the cause of Prince Ali. Husain Nizam Shah met the Bijapur army on the plains of Sholapur while the issue was yet undecided. Ibrahim Adil Shah died in A.H. 965/A D: 1557. Ali was left in lurch and Sholapur continued to be ruled by Ahmadnagar king. The successor of Ibrahim Adil Shah in the very first year of his reign began to make preparations for recovering possession of the fort of Sholapur. To this end he despatched his agents to negotiate a treaty with Raja of Vijayanagara, who, however, did not show any consideration either for the ambassadors for their king, gave strong indication of his deep rooted enmity.

At this Ali Adil Shah abandoned the idea of recovering possession of Sholapur by fighting with Ahmadnagar. On the contrary he formed a league of three Muslim powers i.e., Bijapur Ahmadnagar and Golconda to avenge the insult, the Hindu king of Vijayanagar had heaped on him. When negotiations for the formation of this league were in progress, the Sultan of Golconda supported the claim of Ali Adil Shah to the fort of Sholapur which had previously been the main cause of strife between Ahmadnagar and Bijapur. In the midst of these circumstances, with a view to firmly cement the hands of friendship between these Sultans, Husair Nizam Shah agreed to give his daughter Chand Bibi in marriage to Ali Adil Shah along with the fortress of Sholapur as the bride's dowry and accepted the hand of Ali Adil Shah's sister Hadiya Sultan for his eldest son Murtaza. The restoration of Sholapur to the Adil Shahi kingdom in this graceful way was immediately followed by a concerted attack on Vijayanagar in 1565 with the result well-known to all i.e., the decisive battle of Talikota, Sholapur remained with Adil Shahi Sultans till 1590 when Burhan Nizam Shah II of Ahmadnagar re-opened hostilities. He made two attempts between 1591 and 1594 to retake Sholapur but both ended in failure. It was only in 1623 that the Nizam Shahi army under the able leadership of famous Abyssinian General, Malik Ambar succeeded in laying siege to Sholapur and annexed it to Ahmadnagar kingdom.

In 1635 the Mughal General Shaista Khan made a detour from Ahmadnagar, marched towards Bijapur and intimidated its king into not rendering any help to Ahmadnagar. In return for this it was settled that the forts of Parenda and Sholapur with their dependent districts will be made over to the king of Bijapur. In 1665 came the turn of Adil Shahi kingdom of Bijapur, he faced with the mighty hands of the Imperial Mughals under the command of Raja Jai Singh, Daler Khan and other able Generals. This time Sholapur area was annexed to the Mughal empire of Aurangzeb to serve twenty one years later i.e., in 1686 as the base of his operations by Aurangzeb for the final complete distinction of Bijapur kingdom. The fort of Sholapur at this time was managed by the Mughal officer named Manohar Khasagi Gaud as is obvious from the last inscription described below in this paper. After the death of Aurangzeb in 1707, his younger son Kam Bakhsh unsuccessfully proclaimed himself the emperor of India at Bijapur where he was posted as viceroy and thus for a short time Sholapur may be said to have been held by him. After the pretensions of Kam Bakhsh had been disposed by his more fortunate and victorious brother, Sholapur remained part of the rest Mughal Province of the Deccan ruled by a viceroy when the founder of the present Asaf Jahi dynasty established his own rule over the Deccan, Sholapur became part of his realm. Then Sholapur came under the Maratha rule and from them it was taken over by the British.

INSCRIPTIONS.

Of the ten inscriptions hereunder examined, six are in the Persian language, calligraphed in ta'liq style on stone slabs in relief and they all are in verse, and four in the Marathi language, three of them in ordinary style and the last in Modi characters.

In their chronological order, the six Persian records range from A.H. 984/A.D. 1576 to A.H. 1046/A.D. 1653.

I. The earliest of them dated A.H. 984/A.D. 1576 occurs on the inner face of the bastion of the eastern wall of the fort facing the vast lake. This records measures 21×24 inches. Its transcription and English translation are as follows —

The king of the world Ali Adil Shah, who with Divine guidance and grace carried on so much constructive work and erected so many buildings during his reign that he made the ruined and devastated world once again rich and prosperous. His humblest slave Babaji who through complete devotion to him became Zabib Khan, constructed a landscape at Sholapur and opposite to it he erected a palace with fourteen colonnades. At the time of repose and rest of the Emperor of the world, it would verily be an object of jealousy to the Garden of Eden. It is an exquisite palace which has been constructed, and the date of its construction can be obtained from the (chronogram) Khush Mahal—Happy Palace—A.H. 984/A.D. 1576

II. The second record, dated A H 986/A.D. 1578, is found on the facade of the balcony of the northern gate of the same fort. Its original size is 14 × 31 inches. It may faithfully be transcribed and translated as under —

It measures 14 × 19 inches. This record may be transcribed and translated as below.—

In the reign of Sultan Ali Adil Shah, Babaji Zabıt Khan as governor of the peaceful place Sundalapur, in the absence (of the king) built the mosque in the Hijri era nine hundred and eighty eight (A D. 1580).

IV. The fourth inscription is on a stone slab which is now lying loose in a broken condition near a Muslim shrine above the southern steps of the reservoir outside the fort area. This is also of the same period and is 15 × 21 inches in size. It is mutilated at some places and whatever is still legible of it, is transcribed below with its translation —

By the command of .. the Emperor of the world Ali Adil Shah.. ..has conferred the title of Zabıt Khan, who is the governor of Sholapur in the absence (of Sultan)

Each of these four records noted above belonging to the reign of Ali Adil Shah, mentions one Babaji entitled Zabıt Khan, the governor of Sholapur in the absence of the king and builder of these monuments during his reign. The same Babaji is also found in other three Persian inscriptions of the reign of the same Ali Adil Shah at Gulbarga fort. Sir Wolsley Haig, in describing these from Gulbarga, mentions that the conjunction of the Hindu title Babaji with Muhammadan title is peculiar and may perhaps indicate that Zabıt Khan was a converted Hindu.

V. The fifth inscription in chronological order bears date A H. 1001/A D. 1592. It is still extant on the facade of the mosque called Kali Masjid in the town of Sholapur. The mosque seems to have recently been rennovated because its modern construction is quite unlike that of Adil Shahi days. As its transcription and translation given below will show, the text of the inscription comprises only one Persian couplet, which records the builder's name and chronogram of its construction. Its size is 10 × 22 inches,

VI. The sixth and the last Persian inscription of this article still survives on the balcony of the inner northern gate of Sholapur fort. It is 15 × 34 inches in size. It contains the well-known Shia' creed in Arabic verse written in ordinary Tughra characters. It does not bear any definite date but the name of Sultan Muhammad Adil Shah son of Ibrahim occurs therein —

Turning now to the four Marathi inscribed records, we find that they contain many Persian usages with a local tint which shows that this mixed language has been prevalent in the Deccan side by side the Persian language which was the court language of the Sultans of the Deccan This Persian influence on the Marathi language is apparent even to day. This is the reason that their free translation along with their transcription in Roman characters is given below.

I The earliest of them 9 × 26 inches in dimensions is on a stone fixed in the face of the right side of the burj of the second enclosure of the Sholapur fort It is a three line record written in illegible Devanagri script Only its date Saka viz. 1329/A.D. 1407 is legible and therefore this record does not obviously lend itself to transcription

II The second Marathi inscription dated Saka 1466, is on a stone slab which is fixed in the face of a side of a pillar of the pavillion overlooking the lake adjoining the Sholapur fort It measures 19 × 23 inches.

This bastion was built by Khudawand Khan-i-'Azam² Its erection took one month and twenty one days i.e., from 18th Safar (year) (9) 51 (A H) to 10th Rabi II (year) (9) 51 (A H) equivalent to Saka 1466 Karodi year in the month of Asoda (A D. 1544)

It records the construction of the bastion by one Khudawand Khan-e-'Azam. There have been, no doubt, courtiers and generals of this name in the Nizam Shahi kingdom, but not particularly in the reign of Burhan Nizam Shah to whose reign this inscription belongs although his name does not occur there. However, according to Firishta in the very year when this bastion of the fort of Sholapur was under construction, one Rumi Khan, who was once in the service of Sultan Bahadur Shah of Gujarat, was fighting under the command of Burhan Nizam Shah against the forces of Adil Shah and he had effected the conquest of Sholapur. Unfortunately Hajji-ud-Dabir in his history of Gujarat is not very clear about Rumi Khan's origin and his name but from his confused references to this man, perhaps is conjecturable that this Rumi Khan's title might have been Khudawand Khan at some later date which is found in this Marathi inscription.

III. The third Marathi record dates from Saka 1575/A D. 1653 and the stone on which it is inscribed is extant in the side of a well in the Sholapur fort. The size of this stone is 13 × 21 inches

Group Painting of Six Muslim Saints

BY

MR BHASKAR WAMAN BHAT,

HON SECRETARY, RAJWADI SANSHODHAN MANDAL, DHULIA

IN spite of the strict Koranic injunctions against the making of idols, images, drawing of pictures and paintings, the art of painting flourished in Northern India under the regime of the Mughal Emperors who extended their liberal patronage to fine arts. The artists who used to paint pictures were Hindus as well as Mohammadans. Emperor Akbar was a great patron of Mohammedan and Hindu painters. The Ain-i-Akbari contains the names of painters who flourished during Akbar's regime and who were patronized by him.

2. Mohammedan and Hindu artists painted the portraits of Mughal Emperors and Empresses, the conventional paintings of the different Ragas and Raginis, Darbar assemblages, hunting and landscape scenes. The pictures of Hindu Gods and Goddesses and of scenes depicting the incidents in their lives were also painted by both Mohammedan and Hindu artists. Paintings in the Mughal regime preserved in the various museums in India testify to this fact. There are four different types of paintings such as the Mughal, Rajput, Kangra Valley and South India Schools, and these are met with in these museums.

3. In the valuable collection of old paintings of the Mughal, Rajput, Kangra Valley and South India Schools of painting preserved in the Rajwade Sanshodhan Mandir, Dhulia, there is a group painting of six distinguished Mohammadan saints viz. Hazrat Peer Dastgir, Hazrat Qalandar, Hazrat Sultan Nizamuddin, Hazrat Khwaja Moinuddin Chishti, Khwaja Qutbuddin and Hazrat Farid Shakarganj.

4. This painting of six Mohammadan saints preserved in the Rajwade Sanshodhan Mandir measures 8" x 10". The paintings is painted on a specially prepared thick paper which was generally used for drawing such paintings. The different colours used by the painter look fresh. The name of the painter is not given nor the year in which the painting was drawn. The appearance of the painting, however, leads one to believe that it must be old. This painting was in the possession of a Shastri family of Vai in the Satara district in the Bombay Presidency. Before the same was acquired by me for being exhibited in the Rajwade Mandir it was in the possession of the Shastri family for about 75 years. How the painting came into the possession of that family is not known.

5. The painter seems to have conceived the idea of painting in one group the portraits of these six distinguished saints. The painter in painting the portraits has painted in black the names of these saints in Persian alphabet and this enabled me to identify the painting as being of the six Mohammadan saints. If this painting is examined from the canons of art applied to such paintings it will certainly rank high. The portraits of the saints are artistically drawn. The different colours have been used for depicting the draperies of these saints. I am producing a photograph of this painting. As the photograph cannot give an idea of the colours used I am noting below the colours of the turbans and coats of these saints. The colours of the turbans of Hazrat Peer Dastagir, Hazrat Qalandar, Hazrat Sultan Khwaja Moinuddin Chishti and Hazrat Farid Shakarganj are respectively green, white, blackish red and white. Hazrat Qalandar and Hazrat Khwaja Moinuddin have green spotted shemlas on their persons. Hazrat Sultan's coat is of faint yellow colour. The colour of the coats of the remaining saints except the coat of Hazrat Khwaja Qutbuddin are white. Khwaja Qutbuddin's coat is of chocolate colour. The features of Hazrat Pir Dastagir are Mangolian and of others Indian. The face of Khwaja Moinuddin can be classed as handsome. Golden orbits are painted round the faces of Pir Dastagir and Khwaja Moinuddin. These orbits are painted in good many old paintings both Western and Eastern to show divine effulgence emanating from the faces of divine and holy personages. This is a convention invented to represent an imaginary idea which does not really exist.

6. Immediately after the discovery of this painting about some six or seven years ago I wrote to Mr Yazadani former director of Archaeology, Hyderabad State, requesting him to give his opinion about it. I wanted to ascertain from him whether the figures of the saints painted in this painting can be regarded as the likenesses of these saints. His reply was in the negative. It would be a welcome thing if any paintings of this type in the possession of ancient Muslim families are brought to light which will enable researchers to determine whether they are the result of the fancy of the painter or there once existed a convention to paint these saints.

1. Hazrat Pir Dastagir

2. Hazrat Bu Ali Qalandar.

3. Hazrat Sultan Nizamuddin.

4. Hazrat Khwaja Munuddin Chistu.

5. Hazrat Khwaja Qutubuddin.

6. Hazrat Farid Shakarganj.

Chauthai, Sardeshmukhi and Swaraj Farmans given by Mughal Emperors to Raja Shahoo Chhatrapati

BY

MR. BHASKAR WAMAN BHAT,

HON SECRETARY, RAJWADI SANSHODHAN MANDAL, DHULIA

IN spite of the strenuous efforts of such well-known researchers of Deccan History such as the Late Mr V K Rajwade, Parasnis and Khare, the original Chauthai, Sardeshmukhi and Swaraj Sanads given by the Mughal Emperors to Raja Shahoo Chhatrapati did not see the light of the day. The movement for the search of original documents relating to Deccan History initiated by these distinguished researchers is still going on but none has so far succeeded in bringing to light these documents. The original Farmans, when they were given to Raja Shahoo Chhatrapati by the Mughal Emperors, must have been kept in the Imperial Record at Delhi and their counterparts must have been respectively given to Raja Shahoo Chhatrapati, Mughal Emperor's Viceroy of the six Subhas of the Deccan and the Deshmukh and Deshpande Watan-dars residing in the said territories. What became of the Mughal Emperors' State Records at Delhi is not known. Counterparts of the original Farmans given to Raja Shahoo Chhatrapati have not been found either with the descendants of Shahoo Chhatrapati viz, the family of Satara Rajas or in the Peshwa Daftar at Poona. The State Records of the Viceroy of the Deccan viz., Nizam-ul-mulk is intact and is in the possession of His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad. So far this record has not been searched for finding out these Farmans. Now, as a Committee has been appointed by His Exalted Highness to examine this record, it is very likely that counterparts of these Farmans may hereafter be traced and found in this record. No researcher of original documents of Deccan History has so far made any attempt to examine the private records of the Deshmukh and Deshpande families of the Deccan residing in the territories of His Exalted Highness.

- From what I have stated so far it is clear that the original Farmans or their counterparts referred to above have not been found. Now at this age it would be well to briefly state the nature of the published material connected with these Farmans —

- (a) Marathi translations of fragments of original Persian Farmans found in the Peshwa Daftar and printed in the volume 'Treaties, Agreements and Sanads' published by Wad and Parasnis with the permission of the Bombay Government.
- (b) Fragments of English translations of these documents in the British Museum published by Dr Pawar in his essay entitled 'Some documents bearing on Imperial Mughal Grants to Raja Shahu' published in volume 17 of the Indian Historical Record Commission Proceedings at pages 204 to 215.
- (c) Marathi translation of a Farman published by the Late Mr Rajwade in volume VIII of his 'Marathyanchya Itihasachi Sadhane',
- (d) Shivaji's Bakhar in the possession of Chitnis family at Borgaon in the Satara District (descendants of Balaji Awaji Chitnis, Shivaji's Secretary)

3 A superficial examination of the fragmentary Marathi translations of Persian documents published in the volume 'Treaties, Agreements and Sanads' discloses the fact, that these documents are not grants made by the Delhi Mughal Emperors but by the Nizam-ul-mulk, Ferozjung Bakhshi and Dyanatkhan of Muhammad Farrukhseer. These documents refer to the Farmans given to Shahoo Raja by Rafiuddar Jat granting him a right to levy Chauthai and Sardeshmukhi. From the statement occurring in the first document which is a Sanad granted by Nizam-ul-mulk to levy Chauth in the Aurangabad Subha, it appears that he had already given 5 separate Sanads to Shahoo Raja for levying Chauthai in the 5 Subhas of the Deccan viz, Bijapur, Hyderabad, Warhad, Bedar and Khandesh.

4. The other two documents are, one for levy of Sardeshmukhi in the six Subhas of the Deccan and the other for Kadim Raj given by Ferozjung Bakhshi and Dyanatkhan. These documents contain the reasons which led the Emperors to give Sanads to Raja Shahoo.

5 I next refer to the documents published by Mr Rajwade in 'Marathyanchi Itihasachi Sadhane' volume VIII. It seems to be a Farman for Kadim Raj. The name of the grantor is not stated. The most important features of these documents viz., the figure of the total amount of the Peshkash Rs. 10,00,000 is stated but no details are given. The names of the parganas and villages in the Kadim Raj of Raja Shahoo are stated. It would not, therefore, be safe to regard this document as a true translation of the original Farman.

6 I now refer to the documents in Dr Pawar's paper and the points contained in it. The first document i.e., the letter given to Sayad by Balaji Vishwanath (19th September 1717) and the second dated 16th September 1717, contain the demands for levying Chauthai and Sardeshmukhi, in the six Subhas of the Deccan and the demand for Kadim Raj. These documents show the origin of these Farmans. All the other documents referred to by Dr Pawar in his paper are Sanads for Chauthai, Sardeshmukhi and Swaraj granted to Raja Shahoo by Nizam-ul-mulk the Viceroy of the Deccan. Thus it is clear that in Dr Pawar's paper, there is no reference to any Farman given to Raja Shahoo by the Mughal Emperor, although, all these documents contain a statement that a Farman has been given to Raja Shahoo by the Emperor Rafiuddar Jat. I now refer to some valuable and important documents, which so far have passed unnoticed by researchers and writers of Maharatta History. In a magazine called 'Prabhat' started in 1908 A.D. by the late Mr G. K. Chandorkar of Dhulia, district West Khandesh, very important and reliable documents possessing all the characteristics of genuineness were published in a Bakhar under the title 'Shiv Chhatrapati Bakhar' i.e. Bakhar or account of Shiv Chhatrapati. This Bakhar consists of 53 printed pages of demi-octavo size. It contains Marathi substance of original Persian Farmans given by Mughal Emperors to Shiv Chhatrapati and Raja Shahoo. This Bakhar formed part of the historical papers in the possession of the Chitnis family at Boigaon in the Satara district (i.e., descendants of Balaji Awaji Chitnis Secretary of Shivaji). The head of this family Mr Baba Saheb Chitnis handed over this Bakhar to Mr. Chandorkar for being published in his magazine. This Bakhar after giving a short account of Shivaji's early life from pages 1 to 3 sets out from pages 4 to 46 the substance in Marathi of Persian Farmans that were sent to Shivaji by the Viceroy of the Deccan and Mughal Emperors Shahejahan and Aurangzeb and of Persian Farmans given to Raja Shahoo. The correspondence was started by a Farman issued by Murad Bakhsh to Shivaji. This was followed by another Farman dated 10th Rabiulawwal 22 Julius Hijri Era 1059 1648-49 A.D. In this Farman Muradbakhsh wrote to Shivaji to send his vakil to explain what he wanted from the Emperor. Want of space forbids me to refer to the other important facts referred to in these documents but I will only refer to such of them as relate to these documents. After exchange of some 8 letters the correspondence terminated after Jaysing's invasion of the Deccan. Aurangzeb was informed by Jaysing that it was not possible to crush Shivaji and it would be better to enter into a treaty of alliance with him on such terms as were proposed by him. Jaysing sent his envoy to Shivaji to open negotiations. Shivaji seeing that it would not be possible for him to successfully fight two enemies at one and the same time viz., the Mughal Emperor and Adilsha the king of Bijapur proposed the following terms to Jaysing. The terms were these —

- (a) That some of the forts which Shivaji had taken from Adilsha King of Bijapur were to be given to Jaysing
- (b) The Konkan territory and the 12 forts which were in his possession were to be kept by him,
- (c) Territory yielding revenue of 5 00,000 taken from the king of Bijapur should be given to him after the fall of Bijapur

These terms were communicated by Jaysing to Aurangzeb. Aurangzeb in his turn by a Farman dated 8 Julus Hijri Era 1075 1665 A.D informed Shivaji as follows —

“You want a Farman from us and you have proposed the following terms —

- “(1) To hand over 20 forts in your possession to us ,
- (2) 12 forts and the territories within their jurisdiction the revenue of which is 1,00,000 Hons as well as the forts and the territory forming part of the Nizamshahi kingdom and territory yielding 4,00,000 revenue forming part of the Tal Konkan originally belonging to the Bijapur kingdom and which is not in your possession and additional territory in the Balaghat jurisdiction yielding revenue of 5,00,000 Hons (originally forming part of Bijapur kingdom) should be allowed to remain in our possession you agreeing to give to us 40,00,000 Hons as Peshkash at the rate of 3,00,000 per year

7. On the recommendation of Raja Jaysing forgetting and forgiving you all the evil acts that you have done I propose the following terms —

“You should take the 12 forts named below and the territories under those forts You should assist Raja Jaysing in the prosecution of war which is carried on against the king of Bijapur After the successful termination of that war if you give the Peshkash which you have proposed to give to us, the territories yielding 5,00,000 Hons out of the territory yielding 9,00,000 Hons forming part of the Tal Konkan which is in your possession and which has now come in our possession and the territory of Balaghat yielding an income of 5,00,000 Hons will be given to you

8. The names of the 12 forts are given Shivaji agreed to these terms and informed accordingly to Jaysing who in his turn informed Aurangzeb. Aurangzeb feeling satisfied at this sent robes of honour and a Katyar embedded with costly jewels to Shivaji and sent a Farman to Shivaji dated 7 Jamadiulawwal Hijri 8 Julus Era 1077 A D 1667. Shivaji thereafter began to take forts and territories forming part of the Bijapur kingdom. Jaysing proposed to Shivaji that he should go to see the Emperor who will bestow his favours on him. Thereafter Aurangzeb wrote another Farman to Shivaji dated 10 Shawwal 9 Julus Hijri Era 1077 A D 1667 in which Aurangzeb informed Shivaji that letter sent through Jaysing was received by him and he was greatly satisfied therat. Aurangzeb asked Shivaji to come to see him immediately without any delay. After meeting him favours will be bestowed upon him and he would be allowed to return to his kingdom. Shivaji accordingly went to see Aurangzeb at Agra where he was kept in confinement. Shivaji managed to escape and return to his capital. Thereafter Aurangzeb sent his son Mohammad Muazzam to Deccan as Viceroy instructing him to remain on friendly terms with Shivaji. A Farman of Aurangzeb was sent to Shivaji bearing Aurangzeb's seals and the seal of Mohammad Muazzam dated 5th Shaban 11 Julus Hijri Era 1078 A D 1668 informing Shivaji that the title of Raja was conferred on him and that he should further assist the Emperor and all his wishes conferred on would be fulfilled. Shivaji died in 1680 A D. Thereafter Aurangzeb invaded Deccan with a large army. This war was waged till A D 1707 the year in which Aurangzeb died. Thereafter his second son Azimsha proceeded to north with his general Zulfikhar Khan. He took Shahoo and his relations who were in Aurangzeb's captivity with him. While camping at Burhanpur, through the good offices of Aurangzeb's daughter who regarded Shahoo as her son, he, with his followers, was set free and allowed to proceed to Deccan on the following understanding —

“You should proceed to your kingdom. Take care of the same by putting down fomenters of quarrels. You should remain loyal to the Emperor and should not harass the Emperor's territories. When we are satisfied that your behaviour towards us is satisfactory we shall on reaching Delhi and on our accession to the throne set free your wife and other females who are in our captivity and shall grant you your Sardeshmukhi watan in the six Subhas of the Deccan, right to levy Chautha in the said Subhas of which you are in enjoyment, Mahals in Balaghat forming part of Bijapur kingdom. Half of Daulatabad Mahals forming part of the Patashaha territory bounded by Bhima and Ganga and Faimans relating to these shall be given to you. All Thanas, forts and fortifications included in this territory are given to you. For the present, a letter addressed to the Subha is given to you stating that your kingdom should be given to you and you should be allowed to guard the same. Whatever territory in Karnatak, Gondvan, Gujrat, Tanjore belongs to you should be taken by you in your possession. Whenever the Emperor is in danger you should render help to him with your army and whatever orders are issued to you should be obeyed by you" (Shahoo Chhatrapati's Bakhar) Shahoo then proceeded to the Deccan and succeeded in securing his kingdom. All correspondence after Aurangzeb's death relating to these documents was carried on on Shahoo's behalf with his successors. It is not necessary to refer to these documents at length as their contents are similar to the contents of the documents discussed above. Attention however must be drawn to 2 or 3 important documents in this Bakhar. Farrukhseer on his accession to the throne in A.D. 1713 conceived the idea of strengthening his power by securing Shahoo's help and opened negotiations with him. He informed Shahoo by a letter that a Mansab would be given to him for maintaining an army of 10,000 horses. Before the granting of any Farman to Shahoo Rafiuddar Jat opened negotiations with Shahoo with a view to secure his help. Shahoo informed Rafiuddar Jat that a Sarad for levying Chauthai in the six Subhas of the Deccan should be given to him for the present. Rafiuddar Jat agreed (See document No. 16 at page 26). This document is dated 22 Rabi'lakhai 1st Julus Hizri Era 1125 i.e., A.D. 1713. At that very time Rafiuddar Jat gave to Shahu a Farman of his Kadim Raj and a Farman for the Sardeshmukhi watan. The names of the parganas and the Mahals in the Kadim Raj are stated at the end of this Farman. In the Sardeshmukhi Farman the figure of the total revenue of the six subhas has been separately stated along with a total amount of the revenue of the six Subhas. Out of the published material both these documents are entitled to great weight. All these Farmans bear the seal of Seyd Abdullakhan Miran Umra. The Sardeshmukhi Farman contains to Muchalka (personal undertaking) of Yadorao Shahoo's Wakil. Thereafter Muhammadsha (in the Bakhar he is called second Shahe-gehan) ascended the Mughal throne on 20th Rajjab Hizri Era 1131 i.e., A.D. 1719 (according to the Mughal Badshahi Julus Shan by Rai Bahadur Oza 15 Zilkad Hijri Era 1131 is the date given of his accession). Raja Shahoo during the first 5 years of Mohammad Shah's reign i.e., 1719 A.D. to 1725 A.D. secured from him Farmans of Chauthai Sardeshmukhi and Swaraj. The published materials except Shivaji's Bakhar forming part of the record of the Chitnis family of Borgaon do not contain any definite and reliable information about these Farmans. The substance of the Persian Farmans set out in the documents printed in Shivaji's Bakhar are far more reliable than any of the published material either Marathi or English. In view of the prevailing state of things just described the discovery of any of these original Farmans or any of their counterparts will be welcomed by Historical Researchers. After Rajwade's demise in December 1926 I had an occasion to examine his collection and to my great surprise

I came across a counterpart of the original Sanad for Swaraj given to Raja Shahoo by Muhammad Shah Badshah. The discovery of this Persian Farman given by the Mughal Emperor to Raja Shahoo will remove the prevailing hazy ideas about the origin and terms of these Faimans etc. In view of the limited space at my disposal it is not possible to set out fully the original Persian document with its English translation. I must, therefore, for the present remain content by noting some important points connected with this document and some important facts which are set out in it and to produce photos to enable Researchers to judge of the nature and genuineness of this document. This Swaraj Sanad is written on thick paper which is popularly known as Erandole paper (manufactured at Erandole a Taluka in the East Khandesh district where even at present paper is manufactured by some Mohammadan families who reside in a part of the town called the Kaghazipura). The total length of the document is 62 feet 3". It consists of pieces of paper of the breadth of $8\frac{3}{4}$ " and of a length varying between 2 ft. 2" to 2 ft. 5". Many of paper pieces of this length are pasted together to make the whole length of the document as stated above. There is a seal at every place where two pieces are pasted together. The script of the document is Persian and it is written on both sides. On the top of the document the words "कदीम राज्या किसि असबजहा नवाब याची हुमोहरी सनद" These words are written in Modi script probably by the person in possession of the said document. On the reverse side of the front part of the first portion of the document there are two seals. The script of both the seals is Persian. On one seal the words 'Mohamad Shah Badshahaghazi' are written. The year 1134 is mentioned. There is also the figure of 3 which seems to be Julius year. The second seal reads "Mohore Niyabat Nizam-Ul-muk Bahadur Jung Sipe Salar Muinde Badashah Mohamad Ghazi". With a view to enable scholars and researchers interested in historical research I am producing three photos (1) photo of the front part of the document (2) photo of the closing portion of the document and (3) photo of the two seals on the reverse top portion of the document. This in brief is the nature of the Sanad. Now I proceed to briefly state some of the important facts which are contained in this document.

(1) The names of the several parganas in the Kadim Raj within the territories of the six Subhas of the Deccan are given along with the names of Inamdars, Jagirdars, Saranjamdars in possession of them as also the income of these inams, jahagirs etc.

(2) The terms upon which the grant is made to Raja Shahoo are set out in this document.

(3) The figure of the total income of Shivaji Raja's Swaraj Territory is given.

(4) The specific mention of the agreement by Shivaji to pay Peshkash to the Mughal Emperor made in this document is noteworthy and important and is fully borne out by the documents mentioned in Shiv Chhatrapati Bakhai

(5) The amount of the balance of Peshkash due by Shivaji to the Mughal Emperors according to the agreement previously entered into by Shivaji with Aurangzeb is mentioned. These are some of the important facts which can be gleaned from this document

9. The mention of the figure of the balance of peshkash as stated above is fully supported by the document published in Shivajichi Bakhai. In none of the English or Marathi lives of Shivaji, information about the negotiations which took place between Aurangzeb and Shivaji, and the definite agreement arrived at between them, is given. When Jaysing was sent against Shivaji and friendly negotiations were started Shivaji seems to have made a demand for Swaraj territories (Kadim Raj) as well as a demand for right to levy Chauthai and Saideshmukhi in the six Subhas of the Deccan. "English records on Shivaji" affords most reliable evidence to show that Shivaji was actually levying Chauth in the territories of the Adilshah king of Bijapur as well as the territories of the Mughal Emperors. Whenever he used to invade these territories he used to call upon the people residing therein to give him $\frac{1}{4}$ th of the amount of revenue paid by them to the Adilshah king or the Mughal Emperor. He used to take from them written documents agreeing to pay this amount. If the people agreed to this demand they were left unmolested. If they did not agree and resisted his demand he used to loot them. He never made any distinction between people of high rank and ordinary people. There is a notable instance which shows this. The English had a factory at Hubli. Shivaji's Governor in these territories demanded $\frac{1}{4}$ th amount of the revenue paid by the English factory to the king of Bijapur. The head of the English factory refused to pay. Thereupon Shivaji's Governor broke open the lock of the ware-house and attached $\frac{1}{4}$ th of the cloth in the factory and auctioned the same and thus got the amount of Chauthai. The English factory complained to Shivaji about his Governor's conduct. He was informed that as a right to levy Chauthai was conceded to him by the Adilshaha king according to the terms of the treaty concluded between himself and the Bijapur king he had every right to levy Chauth from the English factory which was situated within the Bijapur territory. Shivaji before looting Surat had informed the Mughal Governor of that city to pay $\frac{1}{4}$ th of the revenue of the territory in his possession and if he declined to pay the same the city would be looted. Shivaji based his claim to levy Chauthai on the ground that the Mughal Emperor and the Adilshah king waged war against him and for fighting them he had to maintain a large army and bear vast expenditure for its maintenance. For this reason he had a right to levy Chauth from the subjects inhabiting their territories. If they ceased to wage war against him he would have no reason to demand Chauth from them

10 Want of space forbids me to discuss at length the point raised by D^r Pawar in the concluding part of his paper viz "It would have been in the fitness of things to discuss the nature of these grants. It is some times said that the contribution which the Maharattas levied amounted to nothing less than blackmail" - But at the same time I may point out the reason which is furnished by these documents for the grant of these Sanads to Raja Shahoo. An examination of these documents discloses the important fact that the territories in the six Subhas of the Deccan had been so much desolated and in a ruined condition that the revenue recovered from these territories was Re 1 out of Rs 100. Obviously the Mughal Emperors were not at all profited by the possession of these territories and it was their interest to see that peace, order and prosperity were established in these territories and they are brought to such a state as would result in yielding greater income to them. It was for this reason that these Sanads were granted to Chhatrapati Shahoo. For restoring peace and order and rendering territory prosperous Shahoo was to maintain an army of 15000 men. It is quite clear from these statements that there was every reason for the Mughal Emperors to make these grants to Raja Shahoo who had become an ally of the Mughal Emperors when he was set free at Burhanpur by Aurangzeb's 2nd son after Aurangzeb's death in 1707 A D. It is not difficult to understand why territories in the six Subhas of the Deccan had become desolate and unyielding. Aurangzeb came to the Deccan in the year 1680 after Shivaji's death with a very large army. His object was twofold. To crush the newly established Swaraj of Shivaji as also the Muslim kingdoms of Bijapur and Golkonda. For a full period of 27 years his vast army was trampling the whole of these territories from one end to the other. The Maharattas who were bent upon preserving their independence and newly acquired Swaraj offered the greatest resistance to Aurangzeb and in order to defeat him they had to carry on depredations on a vast scale throughout these territories. Similarly the Adilshahi Muslim kingdom and the Golconda kingdom to destroy them. The result of this was that there was no peace and security of life and property throughout the length and breadth of the whole of Deccan. Owing to the very prolonged period during which this state of things prevailed in these territories there was desolation and depopulation. The absence of a stable and orderly Government resulted in low yield from the cultivation of lands in these territories,

The power of the Mughal Emperor after Aurangzeb's death owing to internecine and fratricidal wars began to grow weaker and weaker. The power of Maharattas owing to the discomfiture and death of Aurangzeb began to wax. The Mughal Emperors who sat on the throne of Delhi after Aurangzeb's death viz. (1) Bahadur Shah (Shahealam) A D 1707-1712 (2) Muhammad Jahandar Shah A D 1712 to 1713 (3) Muhammad Furukhseer A D. 1713 to 1719 (4) Rafiuddai Jat A D 1719 (5) Rafiuddowla A D 1719 (6) Mohammad Shah 18 February 1719 to A D 1748, all sought the alliance of the powerful Marathas in their own interest. If these facts really existed these Mughal Emperors had every reason to make these grants to Raja Shahoo for safeguarding their own interests and for bringing greater revenue to the state. No impartial observer of politics can term these grants as empowering the Maharattas to levy blackmail in the territories of the six Subhas of the Deccan. Propagandist historians have a knack of twisting historical facts to suit their own purpose. The English had become victorious by conquering the Maharattas. They established their political domination throughout the whole of the Deccan and it was to their interest to represent to the people whom they had subjugated that their Government was far more benign than their own Government which was actuated by mean and rapacious motives. All praise is certainly due to Grant Duff for having written the first history of the Maharattas in English and the Maharattas must for ever cherish a sense of gratitude to Grant Duff for having done a work of National importance which they never cared to perform. But at the same time it must be said that he failed to understand and appreciate the spirit of the Maharatta movement for establishing Swaraj. He was a foreigner in the land, was ignorant of the ideals propounded and spread by the Maratha Saints from 12th century A D to 16th century such as Dnyaneshwar, Namdev, Eknath, Tukaram and Ramdas. In his history he has lamentably failed to give a true and correct picture of the spirit which actuated Shivaji in establishing Swaraj. The views which are propounded by him in his history are intended to glorify the political power of the British and vilify the Maharattas and their motives in spreading and expanding their political power throughout the whole of India.

Maratha Levy on Hyderabad in the year A. D. 1709-10

DR. A. G. PAWAR, M. A., LL. B., (BOM.),

PH. D., (LONDON), BAR AT-LAW, KOLHAPUR

DOCUMENT No. 335 in Vol. 30 of the Selections from the Peshwa Daftar illustrates the policy of the Maratha State in the most critical days of its life. The document is dated 1703-4 A. D. and is an official record of a grant by Shivaji II to Balaji Vishwanath, the future Peshwa, who is styled here as "Subedar of the province of Doulatabad". Balaji is given the right of collection of dahija (one-tenth) and chouthai from Doulatabad, Nasik, Chandwad, Khandesh, Baglan and Karde Ranganagao. One half of the collected amount was to be used by him in the administration of the province, and the other half was to be committed to the government treasury.

In 1703-4 A. D. the Marathas were engaged in a life and death struggle with the all-powerful Emperor Aurangzeb. They were not masters of their own homes and yet, they were levying contributions on distant lands. They had found out that the only method of self-preservation was aggression.

Khafi Khan, who must have seen a few things with his own eyes, gives a lucid description of the system adopted by the Marathas. In his account of the year 1114 A. H. (1702-3 A. D.) he writes —

"By hard fighting, by the expenditure of the vast treasures accumulated by Shah Jahan and by the sacrifice of many thousands of men, he (that is Aurangzeb) had penetrated into their wretched country, had subdued their lofty forts, and had driven them from house and home, still the daring of the Marathas increased and they penetrated into the old territories of the Imperial throne. In imitation of the Emperor . . . the commanders of Tara Bai cast the anchor of permanence wherever they penetrated, and having appointed Kamash-dars (revenue collectors) they passed the years and months to their satisfaction with their wives and children, tents and elephants

Then daring went beyond all bounds They divided all the districts (parganas) among themselves and following the practice of the Imperial rule they appointed their subedars (provincial governors), *kamark-dars*¹ (revenue collectors), and rah-dars (toll-collectors) "

In this way, the practice of exacting contributions from the Imperial lands was followed even when the great Emperor Aurangzeb was personally conducting a war to destroy the Maratha power As years rolled on the practice hardened into an unwritten law Thus, we have a striking example of a levy on Hyderabad in the year 1709-10 A D Entry No 4 of Vol 7 of the Selections from the Peshwa Daftar gives details of the dues to be had in that year from the province of Bhaganagar, that is, Hyderabad It is an official account paper giving the details of Rs 8,00,000 to be collected as dues from that province The exact nature of these dues is not mentioned in this paper In any case, in 1709-10 A D, there could not be any recognised right for the enforcement of the contribution, because Shahu obtained his sanads of chauth and sardeshmukhi years later in March 1719

Mausoleum of Rabi'a Durrani at Aurangabad

BY

PROF ABDUL WAHAB BUKHARI, (MADRAS)

IT was in the beginning of the last academic year that an educational tour of the students of Islamic History and Culture of the Government Muhamadan College, Madras, to visit some important places of historical interest in the Deccan, was organised. The tour extended over two weeks and Golconda, Aurangabad and Bijapur were visited. The astounding edifices, forts, Mausoleums, Mosques, Caves and palaces that were visited, the magnificence of their architecture, the infinite diversity of their detail and the variety of their carvings, both Muslim as well as Hindu, are really the most striking attestation of their grand artistic conception and superb execution. As one looks minutely into the matchless pieces of jewellery in stone at Ibrahim Roza, whispers in the gallery of the grandest dome in the world, the gol gumbad, stands almost astounded at the weird statues of the Buddha, the carvings at Ellora and frescoes of, Ajanta and stands amazed at the Heaven-high arch of the beautiful Taj of the Deccan, the famous Mausoleum of Begum Rabia Durrani, one can not escape the feeling of pride at the vast and varied heritage of the Deccan in realms of art and architecture.

In the following few pages it shall be my endeavour to portray inspite of my varied limitations, one of the several most beautiful pieces of architecture in the Deccan, the Mausoleum of Rabia Durrani, Dilrus Banu Begum, the celebrated wife of Emperor Aurangzeb. It is popularly called "Bibi ka Maqbarah" or 'the lady's Mausoleum', and it is to the south what Taj Mahall is to the North. It is suggested by some writers that "although the Maqbarah must be considered a beautiful building, it is inferior to its celebrated rival" and this is attributed to the decline in architecture that had already set in. In the first instance it is wrong to regard it as a 'rival' for one thing it was not built by the Emperor Aurangzeb, as has been established beyond doubt, but by his son Auram Shah in fond memory of his mother. And granting that the design at the Maqbarah was carried into execution under the express sanction, if not the direct inspiration of Aurangzeb, that orthodox and puritanic Mughal Emperor was not likely to be drawn into any spirit of rivalry on an issue such as this. But the magnificent arch and the crowning marble dome with its four minarets on the corner angles, the tomb with its perforated marble screen, are, one and all of them, reminiscent of that great wonder of the world at Agra. The vastness of conception so characteristic of Mughal architecture, the beautiful setting of the Maqbarah amidst crystal water and luxuriant foliage, are all there, and you hardly miss anything at the Maqbarah what you have seen at the Taj except for the precious stones that are said to have been inlaid there and are now conspicuous by their absence due to the vicissitudes of time, even in that building. Thus the Mausoleum of Rabia Durrani at Aurangabad is a replicate of the beautiful Taj at Agra. It is not its rival, it was never intended to be as such.

Now coming to the Maqbarah itself, this fine edifice stands in the suburb of Begum pura, wherein stood the simple and august palaces of the Emperor Aurangzeb. Some of these fortifications are still extant at Aurangabad and their ruins are a silent yet eloquent testimony of that great Age. The Maqbarah was probably constructed between the years 1650 and 1657 with Taj Mahal at Agra as its model. The Historian Ghulam Musthafa in his Tarikh Nama of Aurangzeb's reign gives the name of its architect as Ata-ullah son of Ahmed who is generally believed to be the architect of the Taj mahal. Ataullah's name is engraved in metal on the Southern and the main entrance of the building. True to the Mughal conception of vast spaces for structures such as these, the Mausoleum stands within an area of one lakh and fifty thousand square yards (being 500 yards long and 300 yards broad). The surrounding wall has arched recesses outside. There are bastions at intervals and the recesses are crowned with little minarets. You enter the gate by the south through a handsome portal closed by folding doors covered with running foliage pattern in brass. This entrance leads on to a large arch in front, opposite to entrance, rising almost to the total height of this hexagonal portico standing underneath this arch you are ushered in to the full view of this most beautiful Mausoleum. The pavements are, according to Mughal fashion, ornamented with oblong reservoirs, executed with faultless symmetry, in which, thanks to the wonderful system of water supply bequeathed to Aurangabad by the celebrated Maanick Amber, fountains still play singing the melody of a bygone age. They seem to go on much in the fashion of their source, the river, for ever, moving and challenging the devastation of time. On either side of the fountains are planted the enchanting Mughal gardens of fruit trees, the slender cypresses and the ever greens lending to the whole environment a charm and a picturesqueness which is at once the wonder and the admiration of the visitor.

The Mausoleum itself rests on a raised platform of "polished red porphyritic trap" 72 feet square. The four minarets at the corner angles are also 72 ft high. Each of these corner minarets has a gallery about mid way and yet another near the top forming the base of a hexagonal pavilion which is, in its turn, crowned with an exquisite dome and a spire. A railing runs round the edge of the platform and a flight of steps leads to the gardens below.

The body of the tomb is again a square and has a lofty pointed arch, rising almost to the whole height of the building. This is the most magnificent aspect of the whole building, and together with the pearly white marble dome that emerges above it, leaves an unfading impress on the heart of the lookers on. Four little domes with corresponding minarets are also at the corners and lend an additional charm to the Mausoleum.

The actual tomb is reached by a flight of steps that descends from the platform into the body of the building. The tomb is surrounded by a screen work of perforated marble. Another entrance to the tomb is at the South East corner and this contains some of the most exquisite florid patterns on the arch and over the pillars on either side. This entrance leads into a gallery that runs round the whole interior and looks down upon the tomb. The windows are of marble trellis work and in their delicate workmanship are any day a match to anything similar found at Agha. The soft and solemn light that is let in through the apertures of this marble tracery is thoroughly in keeping with the quietude and solemnity of the surroundings. The whole atmosphere inspires an irresistible urge to the Divine. The floor inside is paved with white marble. The jambs of the door ways as also the cupola are all of white marble. The lower parts of the building are of the same material, whilst in the upper portions, stone and brick appear to have been used also. But these portions of the building have been treated with a combination of cement and mica with excellent effects. This has given an exquisite and permanent fineness to the surface. And as has been stated, the ground work of marble is not inlaid with precious stones and their place is taken by floral wreathes, scrolls, fret work and other most elegant designs.

A mosque stands on the platform to the western side of the Mausoleum and has five cusped arches with minarets at each corner angle in front. The interior contains a row of pillars which are connected with the front arches and with one another with a series of cusped arch. decorations in front are simple, chaste and neat in keeping with the sublime simplicity of the structure. The mosque, through undoubtedly a later addition to the Maqbarah, is yet a fine addition to it and I am not certainly of the view that it should be pulled down if possible, as has been suggested by a learned Doctor, on the plea that it mars the symmetry of the main building and "many other points of beauty". A mosque is usually a counter part of a Mausoleum as according to orthodox Muslim opinion, prayers could not to be offered near graves and I believe, that even granting a decadent age for its construction, its builders, it will be easily conceded, had a better sense of beauty art and symmetry than connoisseurs of Art of our own times. It may perhaps be fashionable, in Art circles today, to suggest such a course but, to my mind, the suggestion is not warranted by sufficient data and its execution, if at all possible, will certainly go against the spirit and the intentions of the builders. The little mosque is a beautiful neat building and is a unit in itself and thus the suggestion will be untenable even from the point of view of Art and its preservation

To the East of the Maqbarah and situated on a separate platform, facing the gardens and the fountains is yet another building which, was perhaps used as a depositary and a library. The Archaeological Department of H E H the Nizam's government seem to have recently retained the building and taken care to preserve some of its original floral designs and their colours. Outside this vast enclosure of the Maqbarah, we were led to an ancient looking and time honoured building, which, housed and still houses the office of the Anjuman Taraqqi-Urdu and where, we were told that the fathers of Modern Urdu toiled for decades. No better environs could have suggested themselves for the habitation of such a nation building activity.

Going round this beautiful Mausoleum at Aurangabad, the great Gol Gumbad, the Ibrahim Roza with its unparalleled Arabesque and tracery done in stone at Bijapur, and the enchanting art exhibited at Ellora and Ajanta, I could not help drawing certain conclusions. The first is, as I have stated at the very outset, that the Deccan holds its own, in point of its contribution to culture, art and Architecture. The other is that the older artists who worked in the caves and on them believed in the idea that "A corporeal being rejoices in heaven as long as his fame (remains) among men and therefore it was meet to acquire in the mountains a fame which lasts as long as the Sun and the Moon endure." But their Muslim compeers in a later age, brought out Art from the recesses of mountains and caves into broad day light and subjected it to the daily use of man, their ideal being beauty and utility. Who can deny, I beg to be excused for a repetition, the surpassing excellence of the delicate carvings in stone at the Ibrahim Roza, which are according to some authorities, more exquisite than any found in any part of India, or the beautiful tracery in marble round the tomb of the Maqbarah which forms the subject of this paper, to mention but two of the works of art whose number is legion throughout the Islamic world. But all these are subjected to the use of man, his edification and his happiness in his day today life. Art was common to both, but in one case it was only an end in itself, whilst in the other ordinarily speaking it was also made to serve an end

One more observation and I have done. Since so many of these relics of our past greatness in the Deccan both Muslim as well as Hindu, happen to be situated in the Hyderabad Dominions, the need for Hyderabad taking the lead in the matter of Deccan History is obvious. There are several phases of the History of South India that still need research and I am certain that this field will yield quite a plentiful harvest for an individual endowed with competence and industry who chooses to take up the work. The researches and excavations that are being conducted at Kondapur, in H. E. H. the Nizam's Dominions are already bringing fresh data to bear upon the History of the Deccan. The need for a select body of scholars in the subject constituting themselves into a Board, with the set purpose of exploring not only the yet unexplored domains of south Indian History but, what is equally important, to revise certain notions about it that pass for history, is the crying need of the hour. This conference will deserve the undying gratitude of all seekers of truth and knowledge if it can give the lead in this regard

GOGI AND ITS ARCHAEOLOGICAL REMAINS

BY

SYED YUSUF, B.A., (HYDERABAD-DN)

GOGI as it now lies is a small town in the Shahpur Taluq of Gulbarga District—1632' N and 76 43' E. Until recently very little importance was attached to this town for reasons of its lying 'far from the beaten track' and above all its present insignificant position from the point of view of its humble revenues. The importance of this town from an archaeological and historical point of view was not revealed until very lately when a campaign of exploration, research and conservation was carried out by the Archaeological Department of H. E. H. the Nizam's Government. That Gogi continued to remain a favourite resort of Early Man has been attested to by the recent discoveries of stone implements in the fields surrounding the town. During my inspection of the place in 1350 Fash while walking through fields I came across a rough chip of stone which at first sight looked somewhat like a primitive stone knife. My further researches were rewarded by the discovery of several rough stone knives and chisels which proved beyond doubt that the site of Gogi once formed the centre of a Pre-historic man.

After the traces of the Stone Age culture mentioned above there appears to have been a very large gap in the cultural development of the site, as between the lithic age and the inscription of Muhammad Tughlaq which will be described presently no traces of any other cultural epoch appear to intervene. The earliest trace of civilization which we come across after the stone knives is a much mutilated Persian inscription of Muhammad Tughlaq dated 738 H (1338 A.D.). This inscription is of utmost importance as it shows the extent of Muhammad Tughlaq's conquest so far into the South. The inscriptional slab once decorated the top of a large gateway built into the Southern town wall but was found lying in the neighbourhood of a mosque—Aiba' Masjid—broken into four pieces. It has now been fixed together and preserved in the locality where it was found. The slab measures 8 ft 2 in by 1 ft 2 in and the style of writing is Naskh similar to that of the other inscriptions of Muhammad Tughlaq found at Bodhan, Daulatabad and other places. The gateway is built in the pillar—and—intel style and the town-wall and its bastions are also tapering inward from bottom to top which is a distinctive feature of the Tughlaq architecture. The inscription has already been edited in the Epigraphia Indo-Moslemica for 1931-32 and gives the original name of the town as 'Ustadabad'. At present there is no town of this name in the neighbourhood of Gogi but the mention of the construction of a (حصار) i.e., enclosure wall or rampart at 'Ustadabad'—in the inscription has made some scholars conclude that the inscription belonged to some other place—probably, Shahpur which may have once been known by this name. But the cavity which exists to this day at the top of the gateway mentioned above is clear proof of the fact that the inscriptional slab originally belonged to this very gateway and that despite the mention of the building of the (حصار) the 'Ustadabad' of the inscription is really the previous name of the present town of Gogi. The next object of considerable interest in the town is the Dargah of Hazrat Pir Chanda Shah Husaini whose real name was Jalaluddin Muhammad. The date of demise of the saint is 10th Shaban, 858 H (1454 A.D.) and this has been expressed in the chronogram Rukh-e-Chanda. Pir Chanda Shah Husaini flourished during the reigns of the Bahmani kings, Ahmad Shah Wali (1427-36 A.D.) and Alauddin Ahmad II (1436-58 A.D.). After the death of the saint the town of Gogi was held in great esteem. Gogi was conferred as a jagir on Ismail Adil Shah in 1489 A.D. for the remarkable services he had rendered as Commander-in-Chief under Muhammad Shah Bahmani. The fond attachment and devotion which the Adil Shahi kings had for Gogi made them select the place as their necropolis and four of these monarchs—Yusuf Adil Shah (1419-1510 A.D.), Ismail Adil Shah (1510-34 A.D.), Mallu Adil Shah (1534 A.D.) and Ibrahim Adil Shah I (1534-58 A.D.) lie buried in the premises of the Dargah of Hazrat Chanda Shah Husaini.

There are three other Persian inscriptions at the place but they are all of the Bijapur regime. These inscriptions have also been edited in the Epigraphia Indo-Moslemica for 1931-32 A.D.

The grave of the saint is built on a roofed plate-form and by his side lies buried his son Syed Nur Alam Husaini. An exquisitely carved enclosure wall surrounds the platform and the panels of trellis screens show advanced æsthetic sense. About 36 ft. to the West of this platform there is a double hall supported on two rows of three arches each in which are buried the four Adil Shahi kings.

To further West of these structures is the tomb of Fatima Sultana, sister of Ali Adil Shah (1557-1580 A.D.). This building does not pretend to any great architectural importance. Immediately to the East of this building is a small mosque with five arched openings also of no great architectural significance.

At the Eastern end of these buildings stands the Kali Masjid which was also constructed by Fatima Sultana. This edifice is constructed of dark grey stone and this may account for its name.

The mosque is a fine example of Bijapur architecture—entered through a domed entrance crowned with four slim minarets at the corners. The mosque proper stands on a high platform, 868 ft. square, and has three arched openings facing East. The cut plaster decoration surrounding the arches and the carved stone chhajja supported on elegant Hindu brackets of stone and an ornamental parapet give the building an effeminate touch and the traces of enamelled tile medallions still to be seen here and there intermingled with stucco work of the facade bespeak of a very ornate piece of architecture. Two slender minarets surmounted with disproportionately large domes and another considerably larger dome crowning the 'iwan' (Prayer niche) attract the sight of the visitor from a long distance. This dome, like other Bijapur domes, is narrow-necked and a band of lotus petals decorates its drum. A lofty finial surmounted by a crescent gives a finishing touch to the monument. A series of screens exquisitely carved in plaster encloses the courtyard of the mosque on three sides.

Gogri is situated 48 miles to the East of Bijapur and a newly constructed motorable road now connects Bijapur with this town. Visitors interested in Bijapur architecture may be benefited by a trip to Gogri with a view to complete their picture of the culture which the Adil Shahi dynasty has bequeathed to posterity. Beyond this the visitors can have a glance at Muhammad Tughlaq's inscription and the more interested among the visitors who have opportunities of exploring further may pry into the remotest traces of Prehistoric culture. As you all gentlemen know there is a scheme now before H. E. H. the Nizam's Government to provide for a thorough survey and exploration of Prehistoric sites in the various parts of the Dominions and also to establish local Museums for the convenience and enlightenment of visitors, which while affording facilities to the visitor and the scholar may afford the proper means for a synthetic study of the subject.

QUTLUGH KHAN'S POLICY IN THE DECCAN

By

SYED SIRAJUDDIN AHMED, M A., (HYDERABAD-DN.)

ALLAUDDIN KHILJI who was one of the most capable administrators of India and the first Muslim Sovereign to rule Deccan, knew well how to keep control over this part of his vast empire. He exercised only paramount power, wisely granting internal sovereignty to local Rajahs.¹ His successors, however, did not adhere to this policy, and the Deccan became part and parcel of the Sultanate of Delhi. But the reaction to this change in the imperial policy soon set in and centrifugal forces came into play resulting in the resurgence of the Deccan during the last days of Muhammad bin Tughluq. It was at this transitory hour, when the Deccan stood on the threshold of liberation from foreign dominance, that Qutlugh Khan was entrusted with the administration of a major part of the Deccan and did his best to serve the interests of the Sultanate of Delhi.

Qutlugh Khan came of a very respectable family. His real name was Qiyamuddin and Qutlugh Khan was the title conferred by Ghiasuddin Tughluq. His father, Burhanuddin Alimul Mulk, was once the Kotwal of Delhi.² When Muhammad bin Tughluq ascended the throne, he too lavished royal favours on Qutlugh's family.³ The title of Alp Khan was bestowed on Mohammad, the eldest son of Qutlugh Khan, while his brothers Kamaluddin and Nizamuddin were respectively given the titles of Sadr Jahan and Alam-ul-Mulk.⁴ Alp Khan was appointed governor of Gujrat, while Qutlugh Khan was confirmed in his former post of the Naib Vazier of Deogir. Qutlugh was also one of the tutors of the king and the latter had, therefore, the utmost regard for him. That is why Qutlugh never visited the king unless sent for, so that the king might be spared the trouble of standing up time and again to receive his teacher.⁵

Qutlugh Khan's reappointment as the Naib-Vazier of Deogir is very significant. Deogir or Daulatabad is, broadly speaking, situated in the heart of India. Gujrat, Malwa, Marhatwara and Telangana are almost equidistant from it. These parts of the Tughluq empire had soon turned into notorious centres of rebellion and insurrection, because their remoteness from the capital, Delhi, and the lack of adequate means of communications had rendered an effective control by the Central Government, almost impossible. The governors of these subas were therefore usually tempted to declare independence and caused much worry to Mohammad bin Tughluq. He had only two alternatives before him, (a) to transfer the capital from Delhi to Deogir to tighten his grip over the Deccan, or (b) to appoint a trusted noble at Deogir with powers enough to quell any insurrection in the adjoining provinces. Of these, the first alternative appealed to the scheming mind of the king and he hastily put it into operation without considering other aspects of the problem or the practical difficulties it presented. The result was a miserable failure. This abortive attempt at transferring the capital by forcing the citizens of Delhi to emigrate to Deogir made him all the more unpopular among his subjects. Besides, this tempted the governors of the northern parts of the empire to revolt against the king.⁶ Being perplexed and irritated he gave up the idea of making Deogir the permanent seat of Government and took up the other alternative regarding the appointment of a trusted noble at Deogir. His choice fell on Qutluq Khan and the latter's remarkable administration of that province shows that the choice was a right one.⁷

Qutluq Khan was vested with full powers by the king and was allowed to choose his own lieutenants.⁸ At a time when disintegration had crept in the kingdom and the king was harassed by rebellions at remote corners of his extensive empire, Qutluq Khan very capably maintained control over the Marhat or Maharashtra⁹ and even subdued rebellions outside his province by special order of the king. Thus he went to Bidar and humbled Shihab Sultani, Governor of that place in 1339.¹⁰ A month later he quelled the rebellion of Ali Shah, a nephew and staunch supporter of Hasan,¹¹ who later founded the Bahmani Kingdom. Within the territories directly under his control, law and order prevailed. The revenue coffers were full.¹² He was a terror to the centuries-petty nobles who were spread over most part of the Deccan and had developed a sort of fraternal feeling among them because of common animosity towards the king whose harshness and ill-temper had become quite unbearable. They were secretly planning to free the Deccan from the clutches of the Central Government but they knew that as long as Qutluğ Khan was there at Deogir, their hopes could not be realised. Such was the tight grip of Qutluğ Khan. But he did not remain long in the Deccan as the king summoned him back to Delhi in 1346.¹³

The reasons for this sudden recall of Qutluğ Khan can easily be found out. Muhammad bin Tughluq was an idealist. He held his aspirations too high and conceived schemes which though theoretically sound were almost impracticable during his times. In the last days of his reign he became very ill-tempered and capricious as the failure of his magnificent projects due to miscalculations worried his heart and he resorted to a policy of suppression and persecution.¹⁴ This, all the more provoked the nobles and governors. Rebellions which were not infrequent during the early years of his reign became quite a common feature during the later years.¹⁵ The king was infuriated and decided to remove all the old nobles of decent birth and to replace them by persons of low rank who would, he hoped, implicitly carry out his orders because of their former low positions in life.¹⁶ The removal of Qutluğ Khan was a result of this change in policy. The self-seeking young nobles who had got access to the king, poisoned his ears against Qutluğ.¹⁷ The king, in a state of excitement, believed their words, quite ignoring the brilliant record of Qutluğ's services and worked his own ruin by recalling the only governor in the Deccan who was both loyal and very capable. The Mrahat (Maharashtra) was then divided into four divisions, each under the charge of an officer and the four officers appointed were Malik Sirdawadar, Malik Mukhlis-ul-Mulk, Yusuf Bughra and Aza whom Barni has referred to in highly contemptuous terms. These officials, who were quite inexperienced and young, could not jointly do what Qutluğ did all alone. They possessed neither his tact nor his nobility of mind and were only capable of tormenting others. They perpetrated atrocities on the Amiran-e Sadeh (centurions) and treacherously murdered some of them.¹⁸ By way of retaliation these Amirs rose as one man against the king. The king personally marched from Delhi to suppress the rebellion but no sooner did he reach Broach than rebellion in Gujrat forced him to retrace his steps. What happened next, is known to all, the Deccan severed its connections with Delhi and Bahmani Kingdom was founded in 1347.

Qutlugh Khan based his administration on wise principles. He was a strict disciplinarian and a man of high morals. Barni has lavished praises on him and rightly too.¹⁹ Endowed as he was with remarkable talents, it would have been so easy for him to found an independent state in the Deccan. But unflinching loyalty to the Sultan prevented him from doing so. Thus he set a noble example for others to follow while those who were bent upon mischief and would not emulate him, could not dare to act up to their sinister motives under his very nose. They feared him so much. His devotion to the Sultan is further testified by his voluntary offer of services to his royal master who had set out to subdue the Amiran-Sadah. Although the king had failed to appreciate his good work at Deogir and had ruthlessly dismissed him from office, Qutlugh Khan still had deep regard for the king and could not tolerate that the king should himself go to fight with petty nobles. But the Sultan did not listen to him and once again committed a strategic blunder that produced devastating results.²⁰ Had he sent Qutlugh to check the turbulent amirs, he would have been free to deal with other upstarts. Qutlugh would have surely suppressed the Amiran-Sadah and the history of the Deccan would have been quite different.

One of the reasons of Qutlugh's dismissal is stated to be his refusal to introduce new taxes in his province to raise the revenues of the Central Government. This is another clue to Qutlugh's administrative policy. He believed in the prosperity of the subjects who are the back-bone of the state.²¹ He preferred the common good of the people to his selfish gains and refused to carry out the policy of the king in regard to new taxation although for this he had to lose his high official position. These good traits had made him a popular leader and almost a hero. When he left Deogir the people wept for him,²² for, one who was a source of strength both to the empire and the people and a terror to mischief mongers, was leaving them. On the other hand the citizens of Delhi regretted the unwise action of the Sultan in calling him back for they knew well that Deogir would shortly fall out of the empire.²³

A cistern and a Baradari constructed by him at Daulatabad, which still exist in a ruinous condition, recall to memory his eventful tenure of office in the Deccan.²⁴

The First Muslim Invasion of the Deccan

BY

RAO BAHADUR SARDAR M. V KIBE M. A.

THE ease, assurance and rapidity, with which a foreign army, with a complete disregard for its lines of communications, penetrated into the Indian peninsula from the Vindhya, to the southernmost part of India, the Rameshwar, one of the holiest places in India, is an event which has many phases. Its causes are to be found not only in the military or political happenings but in the social conditions of these States.

The Vindhya in the north, from Mirzapur in the east to the sea in the west, along with the Narbada and the Satpuda and the Gondvanas in the south including the intervening part towards the sea, with all the dense forests inhabited by the fierce forest tribes, formed the strong barrier division and defence between the north and the south. The mountain passes were discovered far too late after the northern Indian kingdoms had established their sway in the Deccan, before that the only route to the south from the north was through the coastal territory, which was known since the time of Kalidas, who in his conquest of Raghu, refers to it and which was used by the Malwa and Gujrat kings to invade the kingdoms of the south.

It was not until 1165 A. D. that the Rajputs took possession of the island of Mandhata in the middle course of the Narbada, about its half way. But they were so few that they mixed with the local tribes—the Bhils—cohabited with their females and produced the race known as Bhilalas. This invasion of the Rajputs between the Narbada and the Satpuras was an isolated event and even until the Muslim conquest of and consolidation in Malwa, the Bhils, as described by Sir John Malcolm in the "Memoirs of Central India" were the formidable obstacle to communications between these two parts of India. In the eastern portion of the Vindhya, there were the kingdoms of the Gonds and other wild tribes, who had flourished on the ruins of the ancient kingdoms of the Guptas and the Wakatakas. These circumstances made the people, living in the peninsula, oblivious of the events in the north. It is true that even in the Buddhist times, and afterwards, bands of pilgrims wandered all over India and brought stories to the peoples of the south of the ferocities and the spreading conquests of the foreigners, who professed another religion. They also became aware of the destruction of temples and the disappearance of the Hindu rule in the north.

It, however, took the foreigners three or five centuries to reach the border line of the Vindhya, since their arrival in the eighth or tenth century as conquerors. For the first time in 1235 it was that Altmash looted Ujjain and demolished the famous temple of Mahankal. This also did not cause fear below the barrier, in the south. It was not until 1293 that this region was overtaken by the Mohammedans. Their invasions ended in 1301 when Allauddin occupied Ujjain, the spiritual, if not the political, capital of Malwa.

His further progress in this direction seems to have been stopped by the formidable barrier of forests and mountains on both sides of the Narbada. He must have come to know from his countrymen, or spies, about the territories and even from the traders who entered the south from the seas, of the weakness and at the same time of the riches of the kingdoms in this part of India. Simultaneously with the invasions in the central part of the country, bands of Mohammedans seem to have passed through the wild country known as Gondvana or from beyond Mirzapur and had come in contact with the capital of Devagiri, which was held by the Yadavas, who in past centuries, seem to have been driven from the north and come to occupy this part of the country. In 1304 Allauddin himself took this route and appeared before Devagiri and was bought off. This roused his lust. His General Malik Kafur again invaded Devagiri in 1306-07, while the Rulers of the Deccan were thinking that the danger had passed. They however, did not utilise the time in strengthening their forces but were engaged in abuses of pleasure, extasies of religion or internecine quarrels. The next five years Malik Kafur utilised in by-passing Devagiri and attacking the Andhra capital of Warangal in 1309 and concluded his raid or conquest of Duara Samudra, the Pandya capital, and occupied Rameshwaram. While he was doing this, Shankardev of Devagiri went on a pilgrimage with all his army. On his way back Malik Kafur found Devagiri without defence, overwhelmed Shankardev and his kingdom. Allauddin died in 1315 and his successor in Northern India, Mubarak, invaded the Deccan in 1318-19 and established the Mohammedan rule in the country. This Mohammedan kingdom, however, did not lead to any awakening on the part of the remaining Hindu kingdoms in the south or west. In 1323 Ulughkhan, who later became Mohammad Tughlagh, invaded Warangal in 1326-27 and made Devagiri his second capital, in the south, as he had Delhi in the north. About 1326 the Vijayanagar kingdom, which later acquired power and accumulated riches and became a centre of trade and commerce at its capital, was founded. About ten years later the sway of Delhi in the Deccan was replaced by the coming into existence of the Bahmani rule, with its capital at Gulbarga.

The weakening of the Empire at Delhi led to the weakening of its power at Daulatabad, the new name of Devagiri, and the Hindu kingdom of Vijayanagar assumed the style of an Empire. Its splendour and grandeur are described by travellers, while it still existed, it had defects, similar to those of the Yadav kingdom, and it came to a disastrous end in 1564, although its remains continued. It seemed, however, that the whole of the Peninsula would pass in the Mohammedan domination.

As the above narrative will show, within a quarter of a century, that is from the first entrance of Allauddin into the Deccan and the assaults on Devagiri between 1293 to 1304 A.D. and 1318-19 when Mubarak invaded Deccan, and established his rule in the central part of the Peninsula, the foreign power planted its foot on the soil, which is still there.

At this time the psychological condition in the Deccan was much the same which led France to fall behind the Maginot Line. The mountains and forests on both sides of the Nerbada and the forest of Gondwana on the east, as well as the kingdom of Gujrat on the west, acted as the Maginot Line to the people. The outsiders penetrated the southern barrier while Hindu States in the south were constructing magnificent temples, although temples were being demolished in the north. New States were arising in the south, in place of the Kadambas and Chalukyas and others. The feeling that existed was that the barrier was impenetrable; it is demonstrated by the fact that Kamaldevi, the daughter of Devaldevi, while being taken to Devagiri was intercepted by a small Mohammedan force near the Ajanta Caves and her small escort was quite over-whelmed and she was taken away. When, however, an armed force appeared at the gates of Devagiri, it was taken to be a band of robbers and was bought off. There was so much security felt in the State, that when it passed through its outlying districts on its way to the capital, no notice of it was taken, until it attacked the capital itself. The same indifference was noticed when seven years later, Malik Kafur took a strong force to the south, attacked the capital of the Pandya kingdom and took Rameshwaram. It is a surprise that while Shankardev was in pursuit of him, nobody thought of interfering with the rear of Malik's force and Shankardev, who proclaimed that he was going on a pilgrimage and perhaps allowed so many pilgrims with him that his transport was burdened and his force made immobile or at any rate unwieldy, and he was so foolish as to leave the capital undefended. Malik Kafur, whose movements were swift, gave a slip and reached the capital earlier than Shankardev, who fell in the battle and was killed. This was the end of the Yadav kingdom of Devagiri.

As a result of the sense of security felt by the States in the south, as in the case of France in 1940, the rulers and the ruled were engaged in the enjoyment of pleasures and observance of special amenities and religious orgies. The king, who ruled at the time of the first foreign invasion is described by Dnanadev, a contemporary, and one of the greatest philosophers, and writers in the Marathi language, as a star of the Yadav dynasty and possessor of splendour. The Chief Minister of his dynasty, wrote a voluminous work, describing the social and religious duties enjoined on the Hindus, in the religious texts and treatises. There are more such duties to be performed, and festivities done, than the total days of the year. There are oblations for the manes, which occupied half the days of the year. There is no work for administrative affairs coming from this minister, except a small work describing the manners of addressing people. Fissiparous tendencies, and the fixing of the special orders, brought about by the occupational caste system, so weakened the State as to make it a prey of any invader. First there are the four occupational orders enjoined by the Hindu religion, which confined the Military forces to a military caste or class, which limited the field from which the army could be recruited. It was not even the standing army and so it was unprogressive and could not adopt new war technique. The Brahmin caste encouraged observances of religious festivities and also propagated belief in Divine Power, which they professed to propitiate, by means of incantations and reciting of names of couplets. The Merchant class was engaged in agriculture, and trade. The people of the last class were kept down and engaged as labourers or menial servants. There were numerous sub castes, in the above mentioned four classes, which all combined and constituted the foundation of the State. The glamour of religion alone kept the State together but it fell like the walls of Zeyclo, at the first touch of an invading force.

The entire society was so much disorganised that atrocities as described by historians were committed by the fanatical foreigners in their zeal for religion, or even to inspire terror among the people, so eventually deranged the people that they became more steeped in superstition and felt no compunction in benefiting naturally to a smaller extent, by following the example of their masters.

The holy book called Guruchantra, which is the social history of these regions, contains lives of three Gurus-teachers the last of them, being contemporary with the Bijapur dynasty, describes how the conquerors became themselves subject to the superstitious beliefs of the people inhabiting these regions. Probably it was Ali Adil Shah who being cured of a foul disease; by the Guru; became his devotee. But this fact is avoided by the contemporary Mohammadan historians. The following is another instance. The two lengthy and severe draughts, causing the direst famines, known in the history of the South, resulting in causing distress, gave rise to the belief that it was God who through a devoted officer of Bidar rulers helped people in providing grain to the starving population. This incident is also absent from the history, it is enshrined in the memories and songs of the people.

The Manbhavas and the Jain sects, who not only quarreled among themselves and with the Hindus, tried to undermine the belief of the people in the faiths. The Manbhavas are supposed to have helped the cause of foreigners. This sect professed a secret faith and also their books were written in a secret character. This inspired awe and distrust. It also weakened the administration. The Jains kept themselves aloof from the people confining themselves to trade and the glory of their faith.

The defects described above had shaken so much the people inhabiting the south, that even the new empire of Vijayanagar fell a prey to them, which brought about its down-fall. But as this is later history, it is not dilated upon here. Ample evidence of its splendour and majesty is described by foreign travellers coming from the west. The Hindu character seems to be static, the defects recur in history.

Limitations of space come in the way of giving quotations from contemporary works by historians, but scholars acquainted with them will find no ground to detract from the point of view here developed and placed before them to study and amplify.

The Origin of Vizayanagar in Kalinga.

BY

SRI SRI SRI RAJA SAHFB, IEKKALI ESTATE

THE origin of Vizayanagar which is a Zamindari Estate at present in the Vizagapatam District of the Madras Province can be traced to the time when the old Vizayanagar Empire was ruled over by Krishna Deva Raya and Utkala was ruled over by Prathapa Rudra Deo of the Gajapathis Krishna Deva Raya belonged to the Lunar race of the Kshathrias and was the son of Narasa or Narasinga Deva Raya and his concubine Nagamba (biographies of the Telugu poets by Gurajada Sree Rama Murthy) At the time of coronation of Krishna Deva Raya his court poet Dhurjati wrote thus in the book entitled "success of Krishna Deva Raya"

Krishna Deva Raya was crowned king on 4th February 1509 A D. in spite of the presence of the legitimate son of the previous king Krishna Deva Raya was both a poet and a warrior During his reign the Telugu literature developed to a great extent and he was known as the Bhoja of the Andhras (Stone inscription at Hampi Epig Ind I 366 P P) His contemporary was the great king of Orissa Maharaja Prathaparudra Deo Gajapathi who had under his sway the whole of Kalinga and Utkala and a part of Karnataka He had constructed nine forts at nine places, viz, Kondapalli, Udayagiri, Bellumukonda, Nagarjunakonda, Konda-veedu, Thangadu, Katavaim, Addanki and appointed officers and soldiers to keep peace and security. (There was a fort in Nelluru. It was called Udayagiri. Though it was in old Vizayanagar Kingdom the Gajapathis, rulers of Katak, annexed it to their kingdom. During the reign of Krishna Deva Rayulu the whole territory between Cuttack and Nelluru was ruled by Prathapa Rudra Deo Gajapati. Veera Bhadra Patro was guarding Udayagiri Fort with ten thousand soldiers and four thousand horses (biographies of Telugu poets Sree Krishna Deva Rayalu 1926, p 50 by D. Seetha Rama Rao) His territory extended in the south as far as Vizayabatika (modern Bezwaḍa) where he had constructed on a hill the fortress of Kanakagiri (there is a statue of Durga Devi here) and where he lived with his Kalinga queen and his son Veera Bhadra Deo. Kalinga of those days which extended from Krishna vani or Krishna to Rushikulya river was ruled over by Ramananda Roy (Mohammadan period P P 358 by K.V. Lakshmana Rao) the viceroy, and south of Bezwaḍa was under Veera Bhadra. This territory was left under Veera Bhadra his son, Pusapati Madhava Varma his first son-in-law, and sixteen officers known as Mahapatras (vide biographies of Telugu poets Sree Krishnadeva Raya P. P 540 by G. Seetha Rama Murty). They were Kayasthas. Their names are Balabhadra Patro, Durga Patro, Bhima Patro, Mukunda Patro, Bhikara Patro, Beera Patro, Rana Ranga Patro, Khadga Patro, Akhandala Patro, Murahari Patro, Bajramusti Patro, Thuragaravantha Patro, Gajankusa Patro, Asabanya Patro, Mrugandra Patro, and Kasava Patro. By these officers and the viceroy and his brother-in-law the administration of the southern part of Prathaparudra's empire was carried on. This queen of Kalinga who was living with her son Veera Bhadra at Kanaka Giri had two daughters the first of whom had been given in marriage to Pusapati Madhava Varma who was also known by the name Rachi Raju. He was of great help to Prathaparudra Deo. He was as great and able a warrior as Krishna Deva Raya himself (Vide P P. 514, 540, and 546 biographies of Telugu poets Sree Krishna Deva Raya by G. Seetha Rama Murty) Veera-Bhadra Deo was helped by this Pusapati to plunder Vengi which was to the east of the Vizayanagar empire. Krishna Deva Raya was aware of the valour of Pusapati Madhava Varma and he feared him.

Krishna Deva Raya was conscious of his low birth from the womb of a maid servant and was anxious to raise up his social status by marrying in a royal family. His chief minister Thimmarasu was in his confidence. He opened to him his heart. Thimmarasu promised the king that he would see that his master married a royal princess. Once Veera Bhadra Deo was staying in the fort of Venukonda. Thimmarasu went there and asked for an interview with him. The minister was received cordially and taken with great honour to the Royal court. When the proposal of the marriage of Krishna Deva Raya with Veera Bhadra's younger sister Annapurna Devi was made by the minister, Veera Bhadra said he would give his final word in the matter only after consulting his father Prathapa Rudra and his brother-in-law Pusapati. When consultation was made it was decided that the match was undesirable on account of the low birth of Krishna Deva Raya on the maternal side. This news was sent to the royal court of Vizayanagar. Annapurna Devi was a beautiful damsel. She was well versed in Sanscrit, Oriya and Telugu. She was called by other names, viz Ruchi, Tukha, Jaganmohinee and Varada Raja Jamma. Krishna Deva Raya was desirous of having her as his queen. When he did not get her on peaceful terms, he made up his mind to win her by war. He ordered his army to march on a campaign against the territory of Prathapa Rudra. Thimmarasu was diffident. He knew that the way to Utkala was full of obstacles and therefore the name of the capital was known Bisama Cuttack i.e. the city of obstacles. But Krishna Deva Raya did not mind the advice of his minister and proceeded on his campaign. On the way Veera Bhadra Deo met Krishna Deva Raya with sixty thousand horses and elephants. Krishna Deva Raya was in a fix. He entrusted the whole campaign to Thimmarasu, alias Appagi. At this time Rama Nanda Raya the Viceroy had left Rajahmundry for Cuttack in order to retire from his service as he had become a disciple of Sri Chaitanya. So Veera Bhadra having given the entire of Kanata to Pusapati Madhava Varma, went to Bisama Cuttack along with his mother and sister and all his sixteen vassals. Thimmarasu was waiting for an opportunity. He got sixteen letters written. They were addressed to these sixteen vassals. The contents of each letter were "that the intended treachery of each of the vassals was approved." Each letter was placed in a box full of gold and was despatched so as to be caught by Veera Bhadra Gajapati. Then the minister began to conquer one by one the forts of Konda, Viti, Venukaonda and others. The intercepted letters were seen by Veera Bhadra. He further learnt that the Vizayanagar army attacked the fortress of Kanaka Giri at Bezwada. He therefore sent immediate message to his father Prathapa Rudra Deo that the sixteen vassals had turned treacherous and the Vizayanagar army had advanced as far as Bezwada. He then imprisoned all the sixteen persons, kept Pusapati at Bisama Cuttack for defence and himself advanced to meet the army of Vizayanagar (the sixteen vassals not being guilty were let off but as they could not bear the blame thrown on them they remained in the vicinity of the river Nagavali). They were of Kayastha race known as Sisti Karnams. Their ancestor's names are adopted as their surnames. Prathapa Rudra started with his army and came as far as the Nagavali River. By that time, Krishna Deva Raya had conquered Bezwada, Madugul, Vaddathi and Veeraghatam. The two armies met on the banks of the Nagavali. The place where the battle was fought was even not known as "Ranastalam". In order to divert the attention of the Utkal army which was thought to be invincible, Krishna Deva Raya sent a part of his army to besiege Bissam Cuttack and capture the princess. But the defending army of Pusapati repulsed the Vizayanagai army and drove them to the borders of Vaddadi and Madugul. When the Utkal soldiers were sleeping at night at Bisam Cuttack fully confident of their safety, Krishna Deva Raya sent some soldiers who set fire to some of the houses outside the fort.

(Note — The war was to win the princess who was in Bisam Cuttack. There are no stone or metallic inscriptions that Krishna Deva Raya won Cuttack. "Cuttack" mentioned in the verse is Bisam Cuttack but not Cuttack, because it was not mentioned in History that Krishna Deva Raya crossed the rivers Nagavali, Vamsadhara and Rushukulya and that the mighty rulers of Ataghadha khamandi and hidisingi were defeated Pothunuru, where the pillar showing success was constructed is near Bisam Cuttack.) Yet Krishna Deva Raya saw that there was no use of continuing the war. So he sent his minister to Prathapa Rudra to make peace. Thimmarasu approached Prathapa Rudra with his proposals of peace and marriage of the younger princess Varada Raja Jamm with his sister. In return for this matrimonial alliance it was proposed that Krishna Deva Raya would give up the territories which he had conquered in the war. The Royal wedding took place in 1915 A. D.

Note.—How he married the Gajapathi Princess Gajapathi was a very powerful king. He was the master of all the east coast as far south as the Krishna River. Krishna Deva Raya attacked Gajapathi's son and captured all the forts in his possession. He advanced into Kalinga itself. The king of Kalinga lost heart and offered to make peace with the Raya. Krishna Deva Raya generously forgave him and agreed to marry the daughter of Gajapathi. The marriage was celebrated with great splendor. After the marriage the Raya gave back to his father-in-law all the places which he had conquered. But the Kalinga Princess did not like the Raya as he was a Dasi Putra. "Krishna Deva Raya" by C S Srinivasachary, Chapter 8, Page 10 of 1928)

Prathapa Rudra gave as wedding gift a large amount of money and a large number of servants, one poet Mukku Thimmanna the author of 'Parujathapaharanam' and the territory extending from the Nagavali to the Godavary. The territory beyond the Krishna River was given away to his eldest daughter and her consort Pusapati Madhava Varma. From that time the territory between the Nagavali and the Godavary was known as Vizayanagar. The younger Princess had known that Krishna Deva Raya was not of Royal progeny. It was also known to her that Krishna Deva Raya had played the trick of making the sixteen vassals disliked by her father. For all these causes she did not like the King of Vizayanagar. She therefore told her husband on the very night of their first meeting not to touch her person. The king was enraged and was going to seize her hand. In this attempt the princess' waist belt which was in the shape of a sword, accidentally fell down and appeared as a sword. Krishna Deva Raya was astonished at it and accused her of treason. But her maid servants told the king that it was natural for a ksatriya lady to be armed with a sword for self-protection. The king at once returned from the chamber and told his old minister Thimmarasu what had happened in the princess' chamber and said that he would kill the princess, but Thimmarasu advised him not to kill her but leave her alone under the protection of her brother Veera Bhadra Devo and to give her the territory which had been endowed by her father i.e. the country between the Nagavali and the Godavary. The name of the kingdom was installed on a pillar at Potnuru and it was called Vizayanagar Kingdom. The advice of the minister was carried on. Vizayanagar was given to the princess Annapurna who was called Tirumal Devi after her marriage and Krishna Deva Raya went back to old Vizayanagar where he married another princess who was called Chinnamea i.e. the younger queen.

Note.—Raya's Marriage with another princess "Krishna Deva Raya" by C S Srinivasa Chari Chapter 8 P P 12 of 1928

Tirumal Devi brought up the son of her brother-in-law Pusapati Madhava Varma and made him as her heir and no adoption was made, as the original ruler was a son of concubine, as such the royal family was called the Pusapati and the Gajapathi Family. The country was called Vizayanagar because it belonged to the king of Vizayanagar. A new fort was built near Kumbhilarapur where the queen and the adopted son stayed. The remains of the old fort still exist there and the fort is called the "Mud Fort". She got a large tank dug surrounded by hills in Cuddapah District. It has some inscriptions and the statue of the queen. She got another tank dug near Cumbum.

Poet Mukku Thimmanna or Thimana was a great favourite of Krishna Deva Raya who was himself a great poet. The poet requested his master to visit the temple of Simhachalam. On their way to the temple night fell at Vizayanagar. The king sent Thimmanna to seek a lodging. Thimmanna came back with the news that he was invited by the local queen who was living in a fort with her son. She wanted that they should be their guests that night. The king was not aware of the presence of the first queen and of her bringing up a boy as her heir. Thirumal Devi received him however with great honour and cordiality. Except the cunning poet and Thirumal Devi no one in the palace knew anything of the relationship between the hostess and her guest. Thimmanna led the king to the Queen's chamber after dinner. The queen begging the permission of her lord recited the following Sanskrit verses:

- (1) చరన్యనాంతే నవమంజరీషు నషట్యదో గంధపలీమజిహ్వైత్
సా కిం నరమ్యాసద కిం నరంతాబలీయ సకేవల మీశ్వరాక్షా.

The poet Krishna Deva Raya was immensely pleased with the poetical talks of his wife. This meeting of the Gold and the Jewel was got about by the poet Thimmanna. Krishna Deva Raya stayed in the fort for some more days before he went to Simhachalam. Both king and queen paid their respects to the diety there. Then the royal couple went to old Vizayanagar where the elder and the younger queens met together and got mutual acquaintance. The king went to Thirupathi with his two queens and there he got three of their statues made in the posture of praying to the diety Thirupathi Balagi or Srinivas. (D. O. No. 126-36/45 dated 11th January 1941 from superintendent for Epigraphy, Madras) "I have to state that the names of the two queens are Chinna Devi Varu on the right and Thirumala Devi Varu on the left of the king's figure." These two queens often went with Krishna Deva Raya on tours. They were highly respected, and were very generous and made gifts to the great temples of the land. In the temple of Thirupathi there is a metal image of the Raya and the figures of these queens stand on either side of it ("Krishna Deva Raya" by C. S. Srinivasachary Chapter 9 P. 14) పిండిదేశ కథాసంగ్రహము (మహమ్మదీయ యుగము) పీఠికా

After the battle of Talikota the Vizayanagar Empire fell down but as a memory of it the new Vizayanagar of Thirumala Devi exists even this day in Kalinga Desa. The present Vizayanagaram fort was constructed in the year 1711 A.D. by Vizayanara Gajapati. The descendants of the Royal family at Rumbhilapuram became residents of this fort ever since 1711 A.D.

DECCANI URDU AND ITS POETS OF THE 17TH CENTURY.

BY

PROF DR K K BASU, M. A., PH D, BHAGALPUR

LIKE most of his predecessors and in agreement to the spirit of the times when learning and culture reached a high watermark of excellence in Peninsular India, Ali' Adil' Shah II (1656-1672 A.D.) was a ruler possessed of fine tastes, culture and polish. A great lover of poets and literature, his patronage to the arts worked as a fruit of perennial inspiration to the generation. Though Persian flourished in his court and country, the Deccani Urdu like its prototype, the Northern Urdu, developing out of a close mixture of Persian, Marathi, Kannaiaese and other languages prevailing in the South and having encouraging response from the Sultan, outshone the Persian and became a very popular and common language of the day. Among the popular and facile writers and poets, who wrote in Deccani Urdu as well as Persian, names may be mentioned of Shah Abul Ma'ani, Mulla Abdul Razzaq called Rifat Oyish (noble existence), Abdul Qadii, Abdul Latif, and Abdul Gharri. Their Qasidahs and other lovely and sublime pieces of verse had won golden opinion of the people. Besides the foregoing poets and writers there were others who had Persian nativity. The most famous among the court poets who infused a new spirit in literature and made a vigorous drive for popularizing Deccani Urdu were Mian Nusrati, Mian Hashmi and Mirza Mii Shah Khawan, these writers were the natives of southern India.

Mian Nusrati, who was related to the ruler of the Carnatic migrated to Bijapur and was made a noble of the court. Of Muhammad Nusrati or Mian Nusrati it has been said by way of metaphor, that "by the help of his own sharp sword of poetic genius he gained conquest over the countries of the poets and thus earned for himself the epithet of Malik us Shu'ara or the king of the poets." Fresh in poetical thoughts, of creative and fertile imagination, Nusrati came in the limelight and worked himself into favour with the king. The two famous works of Nusrati that gained unqualified popularity and displayed rare gifts of poetical genius and a wealth of colourful epithets were Gulshan-e-ishq, the garden of love (a masnavi written in 1657 A.D.) representing the love episode of Manohar Kunwar and Madhu Malati and Ali Nama (a masnavi written in 1665 A.D.) delineating the victories of 'Ali' Adil Shah, the Sultan, and presenting a true picture of contemporary events: Besides the two said works the poet composed Qasidahs and Dwan-e-ghazal that are known for their freshness and vivacity in thought and expression

The use of Deccani Urdu as a vehicle of expression was a topic of discussion among the people of those days. The opponents of Deccani Urdu whose number was infinitesimal regarded it as devoid of any eloquence and warmth and criticised it as dull and trashy. But there were others who were lost in admiration, from extolling and glorifying its beauty and virility. The admirers of Nusrati hardly attached any importance to the form of the poet's writing, on the contrary, they dived deep into the thoughts of the poet and went into raptures. In fact, they went so far as to compare the poems of Nusrati written in Deccani Urdu or Hindi as it was then called, to the Persian poems of the renowned poet Qāni and swept the opposition off the field. In reply to the adverse criticisms of the antagonists Nusrati would say —

نہ دوکان کا دیکھا سب و نام

The purchaser should go in for best articles, why should he mind the shop, its roof or its sides?

Here the implication is that one should not attach any importance to outward appearances or forms of poetry but to its internal beauty.

Referring to the merits of his poems that have suffered under the weight of misrepresentation Nusrati has said, meaning thereby that his poems work like magic and put at rest the sarcasms of the opponents, that in fact, Nusrati's Shah Nama, referred to as Ali Nama was a great favourite with the people of the Deccan.

یک یک من میں کی سحر کی چہند حناں کے دنیاں کوں کیا ہوں ند
کہتا ہوں سخن معطرے گمان کم پوشاہ نامہ دکن کا ہے حان

Addressing the disgruntled elements that decry one language and wax eloquent over another, the same poet has very truly warned them against blundering on the treacherous sandbanks of lingual preferences. Hardly should we denounce any language, for it was God who had taught language to Adam, and it was under his descendants that the different languages arose and developed.

The lines written by Nusrati in praise of the Almighty are inimitable and well worth a careful thought. He writes

 سب دیکھ ہی درنا کوں مانتی من دات ہوں وہ پرہیزا کلکن کا حباب
 سنوں کا سمعہ تہک رہا ہے یہاں کہ یک نڈندی منں بسایا حباب

Oh ye wise turnst thou thine eyes to the Universe and findest the handiwork of God on all sides The Omnipotent has put water under the earth and has placed the universe on the bubble!

Story runs that once 'Ali'Adil Shah II was seated in his private quarters and water spouts came out of a fountain close by which gave the appearance of a tree of pearls scattering "nisa'i" over the Sultan Out came the following line of verse from him,

آرتا سر دھوارہ نادی کا کنا بھلے

Behold, how doth the fountain emit spouts of water, Mulla Nusrati who was keeping the company of the Sultan at once gave out,

بہر شاہ نر آرتا لے بی موکا مور چلے

Another writer in Hindi named, Mian Hansi was a disciple of the Holy saint Hazrat Shah Hashim. He gained fame for his eloquent expression, his solid contribution being the story of Yusuf and Zulakha written in the Deccani Urdu. His Ghazals and other forms of verse were unparalleled and popular. Though born blind his intellect was very keen. Syed Masud Khan, an eminent personage of the court, entertained a genuine and exuberant good-will for the poet. It is said, once when the said Saiyid was seated in his harem he called for the poet, and the ladies fully knowing him to be one who was bereft of vision did not go aside. The poet, however, composed on the spur of the moment an extempore verse describing in detail the features and the characters of the ladies as well as the dresses that they had worn, the fair sexes ran inside in haste thinking that Hansi possessed eye-sight and could spy every thing.

The third poet and writer in Deccani Urdu whose name and activity require an honorable mention was Miiza Maisiya Khwan, who mostly wrote verses in praise of God, the Prophet, the Imams, and Hasan and Hussain and hardly on any worldly affairs. Once Ali' Adil Shah sent for him and requested him to write something in his praise, but was refused on the ground that the poet seldom wrote on mundane affairs. At last, being very much solicited and hard pressed, the poet composed a verse having a double meaning and under the penname of 'Ali' Adil Shah. Again, in a public assembly held at night for the purpose of reciting "Maisiya" or funeral oration sung during the Muharram in commemoration of Hasan and Hussain, Mirza gave out a hemistich,

دلان پہاکیں انا ران کر رکھو سندھ طلق منار

To the wonder of all assembled the poet could not complete the couplet. But in his attempt to complete it he became drowsy when he saw a vision. The Prophet appeared before him and suggested to him the following second hemistich of the marsiya that the poet had composed in the assembly

If thou dost bring this present the Prophet would appear on the Day of Judgement. The fact that the poet Mirza was a man of piety and a beloved of God is proved by the incident of his death happening on the day of Hussain's martyrdom. The said martyr met with his coveted death on the night of the Ashura or the 10th of the first month of Muharram. Mirza had passed the whole of the previous night in reciting marsiya or the funeral oration and on the morning of the Ashura he went out for easing himself and having a wash. One of his enemies who cherished a bitter memory of strained relation found an opportunity and having picked up an altercation stabbed him to death. In a public proclamation Sultan 'Alī' Adil Shāh ordered the citizens to take out the banners and lazzis by the Ibrahimpur gate called the Fateh Darwazah. In obedience to the royal order the people took out their procession and on its rear was carried the body of Mirza. The body of the poet was interred in the Mausoleum of Hazrat Shah Murtaza Qadri.

جاسکے بہت کم ہیں اور جو دستیاب ہوئے اُن میں بھی اختلافات ہیں۔
 پنجاب کے گورنر سر مال کم ہیلے Sir Malcolm Hailey نے تاریخ گدوال سے
 متعلق جو خیال ظاہر کیا ہے وہ انہیں کے الفاظ میں درج ذیل کیا جاتا ہے:-

Gadwal "knew all too little about its own History. The elements which have been built up into the Gadwal-of to-day were very diverse in origin and almost kaleidos-copic in their development and it may be said that it had no great wealth of sound material on which to base a reliable record or origin.

ہیں ہم لمبا طو مواد فراہم شدہ یقین کے ساتھ کہا جائیگا کہ دالیان
 سستان گدوال کے فائدان کا مورث اعلیٰ تیرہویں صدی عیسوی کے وسط میں
 گدرا ہے۔

اس سستان کی تاریخ کے مستند ماخذ میرے خیال میں پانچ ہیں۔
 (۱) کتبہ۔ (۲) تصانیف (۳) روایات مقامی۔ (۴) اسنادات۔
 (۵) داخلہ جات مقامی۔

- ان سب میں مقدم کتبہ ہیں۔ گو کہ اس سستان میں اور قریب
 جوار کے مختلف مقامات میں کتبہ موجود ہیں۔ مگر ان سے گدوال کی تاریخی تحقیق
 میں بہت کم مدد ملتی ہے وہ زیادہ تر سیاسی تاریخ اور تاریخ مذاہب ممالک آندھرا
 سے متعلق ہیں۔ کتبہ ایسے ہیں کہ جن سے واقعی طور پر گدوال کی تاریخ کی تحقیق
 میں مدد ملتی ہے اور وہ یہ ہیں۔

(۱) کتبہ جوار پنچور کے قلعہ میں اس وقت موجود ہے (۲) ملیال کو مپا کا
 بوندہ پور کا کتبہ (۳) موضع اچہ کے ہنومان کے دیول کے عقبی باؤلی میں نصب شدہ کتبہ۔

ان سے واضح طور پر معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ سلطنت ونگل کے ہمارا جہ کا کئی
پر تاب رُڈور کے عہد حکومت میں ہستان گدوال کی بنیاد اولین شہنشاہ میں قائم ہوئی
۲۔ تصنیفات مقامی کندا لیا چاری کو سک گوتری ساکن اور ویلی
کی تصنیف سنگرت انکار سر و بھوشنم -

کانادم پدنا سومیا جی ساکن گدوال کی تصنیفات تلنگلی۔ کندو ویلاسیر
میں اس علاقہ کے راجہ یان سلف کے خاندان فتوحات و فتوحات وغیرہ کا تفصیلی
ذکر آیا ہے۔ یہ تصنیفات مقامی نہایت مستند ہیں۔ ان کے علاوہ آندھرا ادبی
کتاب رنگنا تھ راماین میں بھی خاندان والیان گدوال کا ذکر ہے۔

۳۔ کیفیت گدوال جو مدراس کے گورنمنٹ اور ٹیل منیو سکرپٹ
لائبریری میں موجود ہے۔ ان سے بھی تاریخ کی تحقیق میں بہت مدد ملتی ہے۔
گوکہ دیگر ذرائع میں اور ان کیفیات میں کسی قدر اختلاف بھی پایا جاتا ہے۔
۴۔ اسناد معطیہ شہنشاہ دہلی و سلطنت آصفیہ وغیرہ۔

۵۔ داخلہ جات مقامی۔

گدوال کے راج پر بہت بیضہ والی ہستان کے خاندانی مرشد کے
پاس ایک قلمی ذخیرہ قدیم موجود ہے۔ اس سے والیان سلف کا تعلق سلطنت
وجیا گڑ۔ بجا پور۔ جید آباد اور نوابان کرنول سے ہونا ظاہر ہوتا ہے۔

اس ہستان کا تعلق اولاً سلطنت مغربی چالوکیہ
نزد ال کے بعد کچھ عرصہ تک سلطنت مگدھ سے اور اسی میں ونگل
کی سلطنت کا کئی سے رہا ہے۔ اس ہستان میں سب سے زیادہ قدیم اور
تاریخی نقطہ نگاہ سے اہم ترین موضع پوڑوڑ ہے۔ معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ یہیں صدی

میں پوڑور کی بہت بڑی شہرت تھی اور پوڑور چھوٹے پیمانے میں ایک حد تک بادامی (دانابی) کے ماٹل ہے۔ اس لیے یہ مورخان تاریخ کے لیے بہترین مقام ہے۔ اس میں مذہب جین کا زوال اور مذہب شیو کا عروج اور آخر میں مذہب ویشنو کا آغاز ایسے تین مختلف انقلابات نمایاں طور پر پائے جاتے ہیں۔ یہاں کیشو سوامی کا (ویشنو مورتی کا) ایک دیول ہے۔ اس دیول کے اوپر کوئی گویا پریم یا مینارہ نہیں ہے۔ اس سے معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ یہ جدید دیول ہے۔ اور اب تک نامکمل حالت میں ہے۔ اس دیول کے صدر دروازے کی سنگین چوکھٹ نہایت خوبصورت اور قدیم چالوکیہ سلطنت کے طرز سنگتراشی کا مظہر ہے۔ مقامی روایت یہ ہے کہ کھیت میں ناگر چلاتے وقت یہ زمین سے برآمد ہوا اس سے بھی اس دیول کی جدید تعمیر کا اندازہ ہوتا ہے۔

معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ یہاں سابق میں ایک بڑا قلعہ تھا۔ اس قلعہ کے بیرونی دیوار کی نشانی باقی رہ گئی ہے۔ قلعہ کے اس دیوار کے قریب ایک شیو مذہب کا) ایک دیول ہے۔ یہاں کے ایک کتبہ سے واضح ہے کہ اس کا قدیم نام پندر اپڑ تھا۔ کتبہ میں الفاظ بزبان سنسکرت گندہ ہیں۔ اس دیول کے قریب چند جین مذہب کے تیرتھکار کی مورتیاں ہیں۔ وہاں سے کسی قدر فاصلہ پر ایک دیول ہے جو دیرا بھدر اسوامی کے نام سے مشہور ہے۔ اس دیول کی ساخت بالکل جین مذہب کے طریقہ پر ہے۔ اس دیول میں ایک شیولنگ اور دیر بھدر مورت دونوں موجود ہیں۔ اس سے صاف واضح ہے کہ سابق میں یہ دیول کسی جین مورت سے تعلق رکھتا تھا۔ تاریخ شاہد ہے کہ بارہویں صدی میں فرقہ جین اور شیو میں بہت بڑی مخالفت تھی اور جنگ و جدل بھی ہوئے

ضائع کر دیے گئے۔ اور شیو مذہب کا عروج ہوا۔ پوڑو بھی ایک مقام
ان مشہور تاریخی مقامات میں سے ہے جہاں ان دونوں فرقہ جات میں ایک
بڑے پیمانہ پر مقابلہ ہوا تھا۔ اس کے دلائل حسب ذیل ہیں۔

(۱) دیول لکارجن کے متصل جو فرقہ جین کی جڑ تال پائی

جاتی ہیں ان میں پارشتو ناتھ کی ایک مورت اور دو سنگھ
کی مورتیاں واضح طور پر ظاہر ہوتی ہیں۔

(۲) اس دیول سے تھوڑے فاصلہ پر ایک کتبہ پڑا ہوا ہے

اس کے بغور دیکھنے سے واضح ہے کہ وہ ہمارا چاکوکیہ و کرم

سلطنت کلیانی کے جلوس سلسلہ میں تیار ہوا ہے نہ اس

کتبہ میں عام طور پر جنا کی اور حالت مراقبہ میں بیٹھے ہوئے

مورت کی طرح اور پلوراج کے تعمیر کردہ جین مندر کے تفصیلی

واقعات موجود ہیں۔ پندرا پور (پوڑو) کے قلعہ اور پندرا

کاچھی سین متعلقہ ڈراوٹر سنگھم کا بھی تذکرہ ہے۔ معلوم ہوتا ہے

کہ نویں اور سوویں صدیوں کے درمیان یہاں تمدن جین

سب سے بڑے پیمانہ پر قائم تھا۔ قدیم مذہب جین کی تاریخی

کتب سے اس کی مطابقت ہوئی ضروری ہے۔

دیول دیول کے جانب شمال میں،

دیول دیول کے جنوب میں،

دیول دیول کے مشرق میں،

دیول دیول کے مغرب میں،

اس سے واضح ہے کہ وہ کسی شہر

بڑی عمارت منہدمہ کے ٹکڑے ہیں۔ اس دھرم سالہ کے اندر دیوار میں ایک پتھر نصب شدہ ہے۔ اس میں شیولنگ اور چین کی دونوں مورتیاں موجود ہیں۔ ان کے نیچے چند اشکال ہیں جن سے صاف طور پر واضح ہے کہ وہ کسی جنگ مابین شیوا اور مین کے واقعات کی تفصیل ظاہر کر رہے ہیں۔ اس نقشہ کی صحیح تعبیر وقت سے خالی

یہ نصب کیا گیا ہے۔

۲۹۹
اور مذہبی تاریخ پر نئی روشنی پڑے گی۔ میرے ناقص خیال
میں پوڑوں میں احتفار (کھدائی) کی بھی ضرورت ہے۔ یقین ہے
کہ اُس سے جدید اور بیش قیمت معلومات حاصل ہونگے۔

ایکجہ۔ جس طرح پوڑوں اپنی قدامت کی وجہ سے تاریخی مقام
ہونکی وجہ سے ایک خاص شہرت رکھتا ہے۔ اسی طرح قصبہ ایچہ سیاسی
حیثیت سے خصوصیت رکھتا ہے۔ والیان سستان گدوال کا قصبہ سوہٹ
اعلیٰ گوئی بدھا ریڈی اسی قصبہ کا متوطن تھا۔ سال ۱۲۹۱ء میں ونگل کے
ہمارا جہ پر تاب رڈ نے ایچہ وغیرہ سات علاقہ جات کی حکومت ناڈگوڑی
اس بدھا ریڈی کو سرفرازی کی۔ اس لیے اب تک اس خاندان میں ایکجہ
ناڈگوڑ کا لقب جاری ہے۔ ایکجہ میں تین قدیم دیول میں وشو کے دو
اور ایک ہنومان کا۔ ہنومان کے دیول کے عقب میں ایک بڑی باؤلی
ہے اس کی دیوار میں ایک کتبہ کا کچھ حصہ چھیدہ ہے۔ اس میں کاکتی پرتاپ
کا نام کندہ ہے۔ اسناد اور دیگر کیفیات سے جو واقعات ظاہر ہوئے ہیں ان
کی تصدیق اس پتھر سے ہوتی ہے۔ پس بلا خوف تردید یہ کہا جاسکتا ہے کہ

ہولور۔ مالک آدھرا کی مختلف تواریخ سے یہ ثابت ہے کہ ریاست
آدھرا کی حکومت کا پایہ تخت ہولور تھا۔ کاکتی گپتی دیول کے زائے
میں ان کا ایک راج گدار راجہ گنگیا سامنی نامی ہولور میں سکونت پذیر
ہوا۔ راجہ رتاپ رڈ کے زمانے میں بھی ایک خسراج بردار راجہ
پرتی رتاپ رتاپ رڈ کے زمانے میں بھی ایک خسراج بردار راجہ

جواب علاقہ سمستان گدوال میں ہے۔ یہاں ایک قدیم دیول ہے۔
یہ دیول دیوی کی معلوم ہوتی ہے۔ مگر اس وقت گوپال سوامی وشنو کی
صورت یہاں ہے۔ یہاں ایک کتبہ زبان سنکرت موجود ہے۔ اس لحاظ سے
دلو رکھی تاریخ مذاہب ملک آندھرا میں خاص اہمیت رکھتا ہے۔

بورویلی۔ سابق میں ایک چھوٹا مگر مستقل سمستان تھا۔ یہاں
راجہ وکنت راج کے زمانہ میں کندالیا چارلونا می ایک بہت بڑے
نیلٹ گذرے ہیں انھوں نے انکار سو جو شتم نامی ایک کتاب سنکرت میں
فن معانی پر لکھی ہے۔ یہ کتاب فن معانی میں نہایت مستند اور سارے ہندوستان
میں شہرت رکھتی ہے۔ انھارہویں صدی کے وسط میں بورویلی گدوال میں مل گیا۔
راجولی۔ یہ دیارے تنگبھدرا کے کنارے واقع ہے۔ یہاں ایک

مضبوط قلعہ ہے۔ ایوان شاہی کے بعض حصص نمایاں طور پر اب تک نظر
آتے ہیں۔ روایت یہ ہے کہ گدوال کا موجودہ ایوان شاہی اسی نمونہ پر تعمیر
کیا گیا ہے۔ قلعہ کے اندر وینکٹ ناراین سوامی کا ایک دیول پختہ اور خوبصورت
واقع ہے۔ آبادی سے اندازاً دیرٹھ میل کے فاصلہ پر جانب غرب ندی کے کنارے
ایک نہایت قدیم اور خوبصورت شیوجی کا دیول ہے اس گورام سنگا سوامی کا دیول کہتے ہیں۔
یہاں ایک کتبہ ہے۔ اس سے واضح ہے کہ وہ کتبہ سلطنت جاوکیہ کے ہاراجیو کے کلا
کے زمانہ کا ہے۔ مگر دیول تو اس سے ہی قدیم پایا جاتا ہے۔

اوتمنور۔ یہ ایک چھوٹا موضع ہے۔ مگر بڑی شہرت رکھتا ہے فلسفہ
ویدانت (ہم ازوست) کے بہت بڑے بزرگ گوپال داس عرف بھاگنئی اس
یہاں کے تھیلے تھے۔ انھوں نے زبان کنڑی میں نہایت سلیس اور اہم فہم
تھیوتوں میں دقیق فلسفی اصول ظاہر کیے ہیں۔ کنڑی زبان میں ان کی

تصنیفات کی خاص طور پر قدر کی جاتی ہے۔ ان کا کلام داس لٹریچر میں شریک ہے۔ ان کا زمانہ اندازاً ۱۶۲۲ء سے ۱۶۵۲ء تک پایا جاتا ہے ان کے نام کی ایک باؤلی ہے۔ اس کی نسبت بہت سی مقامی روایات مشہور ہیں۔

پنجنر لہ۔ ایک چھوٹا موضع ہے۔ آبادی کے باہر کسی قدر فاصلہ پر ایک گھوڑے سوار کی مورت پتھر کی نصب کی گئی ہے۔ اس کے قریب ایک پتھر ہے۔ اس کے تین طرف مختلف کتبہ جات ہیں۔ ان میں سے دو کتبے پڑھ جاتے ہیں اور یہ دونوں سلطنت کلیانی کے ہمارا جہ تری بھون مل کے زمانے کے پائے جاتے ہیں۔

دھور۔ یہ ایک بہت قدیم آبادی ہے۔ بڑا ریلوی کو اہلکار میں ایجنٹ وغیرہ سات علاقہ جات کی نارنگوڑی جانا بھڑنگل نے سرفراز کی نسبت علاقہ جات میں دھور بھی ایک علاقہ ہے۔ یہاں ایک چھوٹا ہنوبال کا دیول ہے۔ اس کی شہرت یہ ہے کہ پندرہویں صدی کے سلطان دھور کے ہمارا جگان اس مورت کو اس کی دیوتہ تصور کرتے تھے۔ یہ دیول مشہور پندت رور سوامی دیاس تھپتھ کی قائم کردہ چھوٹا مقامی دیوتا ہے۔ واضح ہے۔

مخفی مباد کہ سوم بیوپال نے بخلاف سلطنت بجا پور شہنشاہ اہنگ زب کی امداد کے لیے فوج روانہ کی تھی۔ اس لیے سلطان بجا پور نے فوج گدوال کے محاصرہ کے لیے روانہ کی۔ اسی دھور کے مقام پر جنگ ہوئی جس میں بجا پور کی فوج کو شکست ہوئی۔ ایک بہت بڑا سبز رنگ کا علم اور ایک زخاں کی یادگار کے طور پر گدوال کی فوج نے اپنے قبضہ میں لے لیا۔

وہ اب تک قلعہ گدوال میں موجود ہے۔ یہاں ایک قلعہ تھا۔ اس کے صدر دروازہ پر گنتی کی سورت تھی۔ وہ علاقہ ہمارا شہر کی تیار کردہ معلوم ہوتی تھی۔ یہ دروازہ بھی حال میں نہدم ہو چکا ہے۔ روایت یہ ہے کہ زمانہ دو عملی میں دربار پیشوا کے سفیر یہاں کے قلعہ میں رہتے تھے۔

اننتا پور۔ اب ایک چھوٹا موضع ہے۔ گردانہ سلف میں اس کی بڑی شہرت تھی۔ یہ تجارتی مرکز تھا۔ یہاں ایک بہت بڑی عمارت قدیم وضع کی موجود ہے۔ اس عمارت کے چاروں طرف نہایت کشادہ قدیم بہترین سڑکیں موجود ہیں۔ ہندوستان میں جب کہ ریلوے کمپنیاں قائم ہوئیں اس وقت سے یہ تجارت موقوف ہوئی۔

نیچر پبلی۔ یہ ایک چھوٹا خوشنما اور محفوظ اور مومن مقام ہے۔ یہاں ایک بہت بڑا دیول ہنومان کا ہے جو دریائے کرشنا کے بالکل کنارے ہے۔ ریاضت کے لیے یہ ایک بہترین مقام ہے۔ یہاں سے قریب کرشنا کی دو شاخیں ہوتی ہیں۔ درمیان میں ایک چھوٹا سا جزیرہ ہے۔ وہاں ایک قلعہ ہے۔ معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ یہ سابق میں بہت اچھی حالت میں تھا۔ یہ نہایت خوش منظر ہے۔

قلمی تصاویر اچھی حالت میں موجود ہیں۔ یہاں ایک بہت بڑی چھری
 توپ ہے۔ اس کا طول (۳۰) فٹ ہے۔ بیجاپور کی فوج کو شکست دیکر
 جو علم بزرگ سبز اور نقارے میدان جنگ سے لائے گئے وہ اسی قلعہ میں
 پتک موجود ہیں۔ ایک اور امر قابل ذکر یہ ہے کہ حال میں یعینے
 راجہ رام بھووال کے زمانہ میں جبکہ آبادی گدوال میں ایک خاص مقام
 انین کچھری کی تعمیر کے لیے منتخب کیا گیا۔ اور بنیاد کی کھدوائی کا کام
 آغاز ہوا تو اس وقت ایک بڑا دیول شیوجی کا زمین میں سے برآمد ہوا۔
 اب تک دیول کا پورا حصہ اوپر نہیں آیا ہے۔ مورت کی شکل عالم پور کی

کی اور گدوال کی آبادی کی بنا ڈالی اس کے پہلے ہی میں مسلام
 زمینیں دیول استبداد زمانہ کی وجہ سے زمین کی تہ میں مخفی ہو گیا
 تھا۔ اس نے بھی اس ملک کی عظمت کا انکار کیا جا سکتا ہے۔

ہمارے کاشی پر تاب رو در سلطنت ورننگل نے ایچ کے بڑھاری
 کے نام میں راجپور دواب کا جنگل صاف کر کے قابل زراعت بنانے
 کے صلہ میں ایچ راجپور وغیرہ (۷) علاقہ جات پر حقوق نڈا گوری عطا
 کیے۔ اس لیے بڑھاری نڈی کا خاندان ایچ نڈا گورڈ کے نام سے مشہور
 ہے۔ اس علاقہ میں سلطنت کا کھیتا کا زوال ہوا اس کے بعد ایچ نڈا گورڈ
 نے اپنا مقام ترک کر کے گوستورانتا پور وغیرہ علاقہ کو نڈل کے حکمران کے

 پاس جو خاندان وڈم سے تھے پناہ گزین ہوئے۔ ۱۳۴۷ء میں سلطنت وجیانگر کے ہماراج ہری ہر کی مدد ایک جنگ میں بڑا ریڈی نے کی اور اس کے صلہ میں علاقہ کرنول کے چند مواعضات کی مارگوزی کے حقوق حاصل کیے۔ ۱۳۴۷ء میں سمجی سلطنت کا عروج ہوا۔ اس وقت ایچ مارگوز سلطنت بہنی کے ماتحت ہوئے۔ ۱۳۸۹ء میں سلطنت بیجا پور کا عروج ہوا۔ راجپور دواب بیجا پور کے زیر حکومت رہا۔ ایسی ایچ مارگوز بھی سلطنت بیجا پور کے ماتحت ہوئے مگر حکومت بیجا پور نے راجہ ہری ہر کے عطا کردہ کرنول کے علاقہ جات کی مارگوزی وغیرہ ضبط کر لی۔ سوہیلوں صدی کے وسط میں راجپور دواب پر سلطنت وجیانگر نے کامل حکومت حاصل کی اس لیے ایچ مارگوز بھی سلطنت وجیانگر کے ماتحت رہے۔

شاہنشاہ اہنگ زیب نے جب بیجا پور پر چڑھائی کی اس وقت والی سمستان نے فوجی امداد کی۔ اس کے صلہ میں شاہان مغلیہ نے نہ صرف اس سمستان کے قدیم حقوق مارگوزی تسلیم و جاری رکھے بلکہ اس سے اعلیٰ تر حقوق سرناڑکوز وغیرہ عطا فرمائے اور راجہ کا خطاب بھی بخشا۔

سومنا درمی نے ۱۶۸۸ء میں اپنی خود مختاری کا اعلان کیا اور سکندر وال چلایا۔ اور اس کے بعد سیکن پٹی، تیل گدہ، سندھیل، ہرہلی، آدھونی وغیرہ علاقہ جات پر فتح پائی چل کی۔ اس کے زمانے میں اس سمستان کی

—۔۔۔۔۔ گئی۔ انھوں نے پوڈور کے پرائے قلعہ کو ناکارہ تصور کر کے
 کیشوگھر عرف گدوال کی جدید بنا ڈالی ۱۶۹۹ء سے ۱۷۱۱ء کے درمیان ایک مستحکم
 قلعہ اور کیشو سوامی کے دیول کی تعمیر کی۔ ۱۷۱۱ء و ۱۷۱۲ء تک کرنول کا قلعہ بھی
 سوہنا درہ یا سوم بھوپال ادلی کے قبضہ میں تھا۔ اپنے مذہب کا پکا معتقد اور
 با خدا تھا۔ اپنی ساری دولت و حکومت سری کیشو سوامی کی نذر کر کے بطور نائب
 کاروبار نجبام دیتا تھا۔ سوم بھوپال ادلی کے بعد اس کا فرزند ترمل راؤ
 ناباغ ہونے کی وجہ سے اس زمانے کے متولیان رہا ست دینکا اور رمنیا
 بہ زیر نگرانی بیوگان رانی امکا اور لنگما کاروبار چلاتے تھے۔ رانی لنگما
 کی غربا پروری اور سخاوت کی بہت بڑی شہرت تھی۔ اس لیے دُور دُور کے
 لوگ گدوال آکر سکونت اختیار کرنے لگے۔ ۱۷۲۳ء میں سلطنت آصفیہ
 نے اپنی خود مختاری کا اعلان کیا۔ اس زمانے میں رانی لنگما اور کرنول کے نوابوں
 میں سخت مخالفت تھی۔ اس لیے رانی نے نہایت دُور اندیشی سے
 سلطنت آصفیہ کی ماتحتی قبول کی۔ نزل راؤ کی حکومت امن سے گذری۔ نزل راؤ
 کے بعد اس کا بھائی رام راؤ تخت نشین ہوا۔ جس کا زمانہ (۱۷۲۶ء تا ۱۷۶۱ء)
 ہے۔

۱۷۲۶ء میں رام راؤ نے کرنول کا قلعہ مکرر اپنے قبضہ میں لیا اور
 حقوق ناٹا گورنر سرنٹا گورنر اور سر سرنٹا گورنر وغیرہ حسب سابق حاصل کیے۔
 اس نے ۱۷۲۸ء میں کرنول کا قلعہ سلطنت آصفیہ کے حوالہ کر دیا۔ اس کے
 بعد رن مست خاں نے کرنول پر چڑھائی کی اور قبضہ حاصل کیا۔ رام راؤ
 نے علاقہ کرنول کے (۱۹) جدید قصابات پر ناز گورگی حاصل کی۔ رام راؤ کا
 انتقال ۱۷۶۱ء میں ہوا۔ اس کے بعد ترمل راؤ کا فرزند سوم بھوپال ثانی تخت نشین

POSITION OF THE HINDUS IN THE ADILSHAHI KINGDOM OF BIJAPUR

111

Dr. P. N. JOSHI, LIBRARIAN, BOMBAY UNIVERSITY, BOMBAY

THE Marathas were to the Adilshahi Sultanate what the Rajputs were to the Mughal Empire. Their loyal support was essential for the existence of the kingdom. The Adilshahs recognised this vital fact. Even before the Mughal Empire was founded in the north, we find Yusuf Adil Shah of Bijapur marrying a Maratha lady¹. In later years a similar policy was followed with great success by Akbar. But the credit for appreciating its potentialities goes to Yusuf Adil Shah. This one step endeared him to the Marathas who willingly co-operated with Yusuf and his successors in the government of the state. Another reason for the Maratha support of the Adilshahi kingdom is to be sought in the Hindu conception of kingship and the fatalism of the Hind mind. Once the Muhammadans gained the sovereignty of the Deccan, the Hindus accepted their rule as an ordained fact. And once they accepted the Muhammadan rule, they looked upon the Sultan in the light of their conception of a king, which was that a king was ruler by divine decree². When Shivaji shattered this belief the Marathas could relinquish their support of the Sultanate with a clear conscience.

The Marathas had always occupied an honourable position in the state since the days of the Bahmanis. Many Maratha families rose to power and influence under Adilshahi rule, chief amongst whom was Shahaji Bhonsla, the father of Shivaji. He entered the service of Bijapur under Muhammad Adil Shah and rose to great eminence as a general and as an administrator. Much of the credit of the Adilshahi conquests in the south after 1636 is due to Shahaji in recognition of which he was appointed to the charge of them. The Nimbalkars of Phaltan and the Ghoipades of Mudhol had similarly distinguished themselves in Adilshahi service. Maloji Nimbalkar loyally supported Ali Adil Shah I, at the battle of Talikotta³. In fact Babajisaheb Naik, the founder of the Nimbalkar family threw in his lot with Yusuf Adil Shah when he declared his independence. Yusuf rewarded Babajisaheb by granting him the 'Jagir' of Phaltan⁴ which belongs to the Nimbalkar family to this day. Similarly the chieftainship of Mudhol is still in the Ghorpade family. Both the present day Maratha states of Jath and Savantwadi in the Bombay Presidency trace their origin to Adilshahi days. Another distinguished Maratha family in the service of Bijapur was the Mores of the Javli, so mercilessly extirpated by Shivaji in 1656. Besides these there were various other families, Shirke, Mohite, Maue, Ghatge and Mahadik – still living and honoured in the Deccan – who obtained place and power at the Adilshahi court⁵.

It is clear, therefore, that the Marathas had equal opportunities to distinguish themselves as military leaders with the Muhammadan nobility. Another branch of state service was exclusively in the hands of the Hindus, the revenue and accounts department. The Hindus, particularly the Brahmins, were adept at figures and all state accounts were kept by them. Brahmins had been in charge of the accounts since the days of the Bahamanis and this practice was continued by the Adilshahi Sultans of Bijapur and also other Deccan Sultanates⁶. Just as accounts were exclusively in the hands of the Brahmins, the collection of revenue was entrusted to Maratha officers. All the revenue officers in the various parts of the kingdom were thus usually Hindus. But Brahmins also occupied other positions in the state. Garcia de Oita notices that they were employed by the kings of the Deccan as "treasurers, writers, collectors of rent and ambassadors"⁷. Particularly were they employed as envoys and occasionally even as ministers⁸. The Hindus thus possessed considerable administrative power and some political influence in the Deccan Sultanates. They also occupied high positions in the civic life of the capital. Asad Beg, the Mughal ambassador, found that the headmen of the various artisan guilds were Hindus.

Government of the state, therefore, was not entirely in the hands of the Muhammadans, the Hindus had a considerable share in it. This made it impossible for the Muhammadan powers to retain their bigotry and fanaticism. With the exception of Muhammad Adilshah none of the sultans of Bijapur showed intolerance towards their Hindu subjects. Ibrahim Adil Shah I, a staunch Sunni, showed great preference for Hindus over Pardesi Muhammadans⁹ and Ali Adil Shah I, interested himself in Hindu 'Sanyasis' and priests. Like Akbar he used to delight in discussing philosophical problems with them and rewarded them liberally.¹⁰ Ibrahim II, even came under the suspicion of being a devotee of the Hindu goddess of learning, Saraswati, and was known, and is still remembered in the Deccan, by the Sanskrit epithet Jagatguru,¹¹ (जगद्गुरु). The legend on his copper coins (نصير) 'Protector of the weak'¹² a pure Sanskrit phrase, bears eloquent testimony to the influence of Hinduism on him.

The Adilshahi Sultans put into practice the tolerance which they felt towards their Hindu subjects. Hindu temples in various parts of the kingdom were given liberal endowments by the kings.¹³ Sometimes a Hindu noble would make similar endowments,¹⁴ and this practice was not interfered with. Pandharpur, the centre of the democratic Bhakti cult,¹⁵ was in the Adilshahi kingdom. The place was never disturbed by the rulers. The Hindu priestly classes were left to practice their profession in peace, their hereditary rights were scrupulously upheld and lands were given to them for their maintenance or arrangements were made with state-officials by which they were given small cash payments.¹⁶ One Joshi family known to the present writer still holds 'Adilshahi' 'firmans' confirming the grant of a small yearly income on them and the right to practice their priestly profession in certain villages in the Konkan.¹⁷ Another Joshi family near Rajapur got their living from 'inam' lands confirmed to them by the Adilshahs.¹⁸ Many of the grants made to the priestly classes by Shivaji and his descendants were mere confirmations and continuations of those bestowed during Adilshahi rule.¹⁹

The general life of the Hindu community was left to itself under Adilshahi rule. No attempts were made to superimpose the culture of the rulers on their Hindu subjects. The traces of Persian influence on the Marathi language and of the Muhammadan dress on the dress of the Marathas were due to the people themselves. Such Hindu institutions as obtained in the villages were left untouched, possibly because the Muhammadan rulers had no alternative system of village administration. But the real reason was that it was impossible for the Muhammadans to change the life of the people sanctified by tradition that had its roots in the ancient past. The Deccan sultanates wisely understood this cardinal fact as is shown by the policy they adopted towards their Hindu subjects.

The only Adilshahi king who adopted an active policy of suppression of the Hindus was Muhammad Adil Shah²⁰. But even he seems to have been aware for a time that the Marathas were the backbone of his kingdom, and he was careful not to violate any of the practices followed by his predecessors. Thus we find that he continued the grant of the 'inam' lands to Hindu temples made during the reign of his father Ibrahim Adil Shah II²¹. But his religious zeal proved greater than his statesmanship and he succumbed to the idea of spreading the glory of Islam, unmindful of its reactions on the Marathas. No other Adilshahi sultan had adopted a policy of religious intolerance, for they knew that it was sure to create resentment among their subjects. It was here that Muhammad 'Adil Shah failed. He failed to understand the strength of the rising tide of Maratha patriotism and his unwise policy only helped to bring the Marathas closer together under the leadership of Shivaji.

Presidential Address.

Modern Section (from 1724 A.D.)

First Deccan History Conference, Hyderabad,

April 1945.

BY

RAO BAHADUR PROF C S SRINIVASACHARI, M A ,

Professor of History and Politics,

Annamalai University, Annamalai Nagar, (S India)

I am very grateful to the organisers of the First Deccan History Conference for having conferred on me the honour of presiding over the Modern Section. I am an humble camp follower in the army of the students and researchers in Indian History and I have been serving for many years in this division of our army, and I deem that my election to the Presidentship of this section is only a symbol and manifestation of that spirit of democratic equality that animates all our scholars. The task of interpreting the several note-worthy phases of the political, institutional, cultural and economic history of Modern Deccan since the foundation of the Asaf Jahi State in 1724 A.D. has been developing an increasing complexity and expanding scope in the last quarter of a century. A careful and correctly based exposition of the phases of interaction of military, political and other forces, cultural and social, has been rendered more difficult, and at the same time, more significant, not only because our data are accumulating fast, but also on account of the numerous and markedly divergent points of view animating the minds of the interpreters. The continually growing amount of material, specially in the shape of records and contemporary letters, tracts and books, is staggering in quantity and perplexing in its varying values and degrees of significance. Moreover, the workers in our field are labouring under a serious handicap arising out of an unconscious subjective bias or a conviction and a sub-conscious tendency to import a great deal more of the element of personal and other points of view than would be scientifically correct. The decay of the indigedous political system in general and the rise and establishment of British domination in the land in the period have naturally led to the interpretation of historical data from points of view that have changed, in some respects very radically, from generation to generation.

With reference to the Deccan, the foundation on a firm basis of the Hyderabad State by the great diplomat-administrator-general, Nizam-ul-Mulk Asaf Jah Bahadur has fittingly served as the starting point of a new period, and the continued life and vitality it has maintained uninterruptedly since its inception has constituted a very unique feature and likewise served to give an institutional continuity to the life of a large proportion of the people and territory of the Deccan. With regard to South India proper, into which the Muslim power had begun its effective penetration about the middle of the 17th century, there was operating a simultaneous phenomenon, viz. the establishment of the coastal factories of the different European nationalities, which were soon to serve as the starting points of their respective political and military ambition. The history of the 18th century was marked by an increasing loss of vitality on the part of the indigenous rulers and by the spread, throughout the country, of a disruptive type of feudalism that broke down the old institutional organisation and fostered no new growth except that of the hated peon and the tax-collector coming in his wake, and ate away consequently much the best part of the indigenous machinery of local administration. This constitutes the main explanation why the administrative and social history of the 18th century, and that with particular reference to South India, has so far remained relatively unexplored and but thinly interpreted, while even now there is a lack of really sound literature bearing on the administrative and social history of land in the recent centuries. Even our political history literature has continued to retain the colour and the tempo given to it by the early historians of the British power like Orme, Cambridge, Mark Wilks and James Mill. Most writers of that early age, and some even of the more recent times, became unconsciously inclined to find extra-historical and quasi-providential reasons for the vitality and dominance of the British power and culture as against the weakened and demoralised indigenous governments and systems of life. Many of us suffer, even at the present day, from an insidious disease which makes us live in and write with a quasi-English mentality and from a half-foreign angle, resulting in a disproportionately stressed appreciation of western political and administrative ideals and an artificial enhancement of their value. This tendency has produced a lack of really accurate and objective treatment of topics on the other side also, by writers of the west.

There has been steadily growing in the last century an increasingly vigorous, intellectual and political life in the land thoroughly impelled and influenced by British political practice, ideology and literature, and more recently, the marked growth of Indian nationalistic thought has produced a new bias which has, strangely enough, worked in two glaringly conflicting directions. It is well worth repetition that the material at the disposal of the student for the recent two centuries and a half is 'staggering in quantity and bewildering in its range,' and consequently the difficulty of co-ordination of the growing mass is like-wise formidable in many respects, particularly in the delineation of diplomatic dealings and pictures of cultural and economic life. We have however one definite advantage over workers in other fields. The cross of romanticism and commonplace sentimentalism, which occasionally permeates research in more antique epochs can affect this period only in a markedly smaller measure. But then we have to suffer under a counteracting disadvantage, as there is also in operation the more serious, and in reality the more insidious, danger of researchers trying to read, either by reason of an unconscious bias or by force of sub-conscious analogy, a great deal more than is justifiable in a rigidly objective process of elucidation and reasoning that should mark the study of the factors that brought about the decay of the Muslim and Maratha powers and the rise and establishment, in the whole country, of the British, in preference to other European, domination.

Personalities and individual achievements have rightly claimed a large proportion of the attention of historians and researchers in the modern age, and in their treatment, particularly in respect of political, military and diplomatic transactions, partisanship of a varying character, has been in abundant evidence in our historical literature.

II

Nizamul-Mulk Asaf Jah not only founded the Hyderabad State, but also stabilised and organised it. He was a man of high principles and was endowed with a remarkable amount of political sagacity and statesmanship. He brought peace and security to a distracted country. In the words of the learned scholar, Nawab Ali Yawar Jung, "He was no mean scholar and poet, no less an administrator in peace than a general in war. No series on the 'Rulers of India' is complete without him, and history has done scant justice to his achievements. He did not only command armies, he was a leader of men, he did not only found a State, he organised and established it. The basic divisions of Divani, Sarf-e-Khas and Paigah owe their origin to him. He brought peace and security to a distracted land, he had the wisdom to seek the substance, not the shadow, of power, he may never have 'declared' his independence, but he was independent, and he had the stature and the sinews to maintain it, and yet, when Nadir rode with blood and thunder into Hindustan, he marched to the defence of Delhi, the scene of his ancient loyalty, against the invader of India."

Nawab Asaf Jah's authority and jurisdiction extended as far as Trichinopoly in the South and covered the subah of Arcot. The intrigues and disorder that broke out after his death had been foreseen by contemporary observers, both European and Indian, but not certainly the full extent of the disastrous consequences that ensued and brought about European interference—in a most unexpected manner and with fatal results—in the affairs of the State and the dominance first of the French and later of the English powers that was planted at the Deccan court, in an unshakable manner. This period of confusion and political instability lasted in its first phase from 1751 to 1762. In the long reign of Nizam Ali Khan, who is certainly entitled to credit, as a very cautious ruler, there occurred the usual "give and take wars" between the Nizam, the Marathas and Mysore with the English and the French participating as opportunity offered. The cession of the Northern Circars to the British in 1765 and the disturbances caused by the frequent incursions of Hyder Ali and Tipu Sultan led in 1786 to the despatch of an English mission under Holland to Hyderabad and subsequently to the appointment of a Resident British Minister at that court.

Meanwhile French influence waxed and waned under Raymond who was the master both of Perion and Baptiste, who were noted among the noticeable European adventurers of the age. Raymond died in 1798, and soon afterwards under the influence of the now securely established English power, his forces were disarmed and disbanded in a most dramatic manner. Thus ended the last phase of the attempt at building up French ascendancy at Hyderabad. The actual disarmament of the French contingent was carried out by the Subsidiary Force Troops, first raised by the English under a treaty in 1765 for the support of the Nizam's Government.

Nawab Nizam Ali Khan died in 1803 in the same year as the battle of Assaye, with British influence established over his state securely and permanently. He was followed by his son, Nizam Sikandar Jah, whose rule was uneventful except for the ill-fated machination of Rajah Mahipat Ram against the British and for the vigorous efforts made by the Resident Sir Charles Metcalfe to counteract the doings of Rajah Chandu Lal, the Peshkar, who was the virtual minister for the last ten years of the reign. It was at this stage that the government began to drift into the terrible financial and administrative troubles that fill a large portion of the canvas of Deccan History in the first half of the 19th century.

The next Nizam, Nawab Nasir ud-Daula, ruled for a fairly long period. His reign was marked by a serious Wahabi conspiracy which aimed at the overthrow of English dominance and whose origin and spread were shrouded in obscurity and by the great sectarian riots that broke out in the capital between the Sunni and the Shia factions, as well as by the vexed question of the assignment of the Berars to the English. This reign also witnessed the appointment of the illustrious Salār Jung to the Ministership and the consequent cessation of the confusion in the administration that had continued for fully ten years after the resignation of Rajah Chandu Lal in 1843. The rule of the next Nizam, Nawab Afzal-ul Daula was marked, first and foremost by the steadfast loyalty of the State towards the English in the crisis of the Mutiny. He was succeeded by his infant son, the Nizam Mahbub Ali Khan, he had an illustrious reign of great significance for the development of the State, and during his long minority, the great Minister, Salār Jung, continued to work till his sudden death in 1883. The period covered by the reign of Nizam Mahbub Ali Khan and H. E. H. the present Nizam of Hyderabad and Berar—may he continue to reign long—has constituted an era of full fledged development of the State and its Prajas in every aspect of life.

Not only do the achievements and the features of the rule of the successive Nizams constitute apt and suitable subjects for the labours of the students but also the records of the achievements of the distinguished line of ministers form an additional suitable field of investigation. Their greatness may be traced back to the times of Syed Lashkar Khan and his equally great rival, Shah Nawaz Khan. The latter spent the seven years of his exile from the Nizam's court in writing the greater part of his famous biographical work, which has been of such utility to students of Indian History. The part that these two great ministers played in the dark days that followed the death of the great Asaf Jah requires further elucidation. The illustrious Diwan of Nizam Ali, Ghulam Sayid Khan, generally known by his titles Azim-ul-Umara and Arastu Jah, helped the English in their wars against Tipu and even went, for reasons of state advantage, into captivity into the hands of the Marathas after Khairla. His valuable services to Peshwa Bajirao II, particularly in the matter of obtaining his succession, secured for him not only his personal release from captivity but also the restoration to the Nizam of the ceded territories.

The next Minister was equally famous. Meer Alam Bahadur had represented the Nizam's Government at Calcutta in 1786 and had acted as minister when Azim-ul-Umara was absent at Poona as the state's hostage, he was present at the taking of Seringapatam and succeeded Azim-ul-Umara in the Ministry. His great public work was the well known lake near Hyderabad named after him and constructed from out of his share of the prize money that he got in the capture of Seringapatam.

Meer Alam's successor was his son-in-law Munirul Mulk, in whose time the Peshkar Raja Chandulal rose into prominence and became the defacto minister. The great Meer Turab Ali Sir Salai Jung, Mukhtarul-Mulk has become almost a legendary figure, and the fortunes and achievements of his family which has given several ministers to the State constitute a little explored field of research well worthy of study.

The history of the British Residency itself is again another subject of arresting personal interest and political significance. From the time of Sir John Kennoway, Resident 1788-93, one can proceed on through the epoch of the two brothers, Major William Kirkpatrick and Col. Achilles Kirkpatrick, the latter being the first Resident who represented both the governments, then through the rule of Captain Sydenham and Sir Henry Russel and then across to the times of the great Sir Charles Metcalfe, whose energetic remonstrances against the evils of the day and useful attempts at reform are matters of general history—and then we have got plenty of material bearing on the doings of the succeeding Residents like Col. Stewart, General Fraser and Col. Love. Then again there are the great noble families like that of Amir Kabir, which afford interesting topics of study.

The period 1799-1819 is rich with consequences for the history of the Deccan and it has a personal interest "exceeding that of any other period in British Indian relations," and rich in the many actions of men who were marked by outstanding gifts of individuality and character. I may here put forth a plea for a specially intensive study of this epoch, particularly of its personality aspect, though 'personality' history is not now much in vogue, and though the approach to history through the medium of men, rather than of social factors and trends is 'suspected of leanings to the Ruritanian school of history'.

III

A strong plea has been put forth for the preparation of a series of volumes on the History and Legacy of the Deccan, and one of the arguments brought forth is that it is "only in answer to the violence done to our History and to the History of India in general by the joint authors of the recent publication who describe the three main concerns of the rulers of India as being the maintenance of an army, the collection of revenue and the development of espionage." The same writer continues thus—"The history of the Deccan under the Asaf Jahi Dynasty is also the history of cultural, administrative and economic development, and it should be properly correlated to the scheme of a comprehensive history of India projected by the Indian History Congress even as it is necessary for this movement of this Deccan History Congress to associate itself closely with and not to run counter in anyway against the Indian History Congress itself "

Further it has been stressed that the Asaf Jahi period is specially rich in the histories and historians that it has produced. From the time of Shah Nawaz Khan, there accumulated a rich heritage of valuable source books of contemporary character and worth for both the earlier and the later stages of the epoch. Nawab Ali Yawar Jung writes thus succinctly about the historical material available for the period "The student of Deccan history would do well, as a matter of fact, to begin with the study and classification of the bibliography of the period, he would no doubt include those many French and English sources which have already been published, and the invaluable collections of original documents in London and Paris, Delhi, Poona, Madras and Pondicherry, where much of our history is preserved. There are treasures nearer home, among the private collections may specially be mentioned the documents in the possession of Nawab Salai Jung Bahadur and the Paigahs and the Peshkari Estate, not to mention the manuscripts at Kalyani and Aurangabad and in the Saidiyah Library. The Asafiyah State Library, which has just celebrated its golden jubilee, and the Daftar e-Divani, have also large collections of manuscripts bearing on the history of the Deccan. The latter, an amalgamation of three or four old offices, each with a history of its own contains an exhaustive record of sanads and grants and of documents dating back to the Emperor Jahangir. Many of the treaties and engagements contracted by the State are preserved in the Daftar which also possesses innumerable Firmans of different Rulers, letters from news-agents at different Courts in India and much interesting material dealing, among other matters, with Hyderabad's trade by sea on the east coast and its shipbuilding activities for which timber was brought from the Northern Circars."

The State Records might very well be supplemented and enriched by the absorption into them of all categories of State papers, which, as in the case of many British ministerial families, have been left in the private record collections of the families of the respective ministers. The Osmania University has naturally enough, emphasised the value of the study of Deccan History. For the preparation of authentic volumes bearing on it steps have been taken and experts have been invited for writing out the various chapters of the projected volumes. In this respect, it has been well remarked elsewhere that what has become known as Mulkī or Deccanī sentiment should, so far as we historians are concerned, be essentially viewed as a justifiable pride in the past achievements of the Deccan and as stimulating a sincere endeavour to present it not in any aggressive form, but in its true perspective.

and in its proper setting in the general picture of India's cultural and political history. The Deccan, particularly the core of it, the Asaf Jahi State, has, naturally enough, a very rich and almost unrivalled legacy of cultural and historical heritage, the continuity of which though contributed by different races and peoples, is very remarkable. Let me join in echoing the following remarkable passage as to its real value and character. "In its associations with great scenes of the Ramayana and the Mahabharatha, in its having been the abode of the earliest writers of Maharashtra and the great poets of the language of Kannada, in the facts of its having housed the Andhra Nagas of ancient times, in its expression in colour and its symbolism in form of the rocks of Ajanta and Ellora, and again, in its noble ruins of Madrasah of Mahmud Gawan at Bidar and the library of Malik Amber at Aurangabad, in the great dams of recent times constructed to contain reserves of water for the peasant and in architecture such as you find in this building, harmonising the concepts of the two great cultures which have found one home, in all these and many more we have common objects of pride, and the resulting heritage belongs to one and all of us equally. No political controversy or economic urge of the day can alter that fundamental fact of history. It has led to the age-long consciousness of an entity and to an instinct to defend it against external interference which found its personification in Chand Bibi and Malik Amber. The same instinct runs down the ages to the present, and when the wealth of the heritage is known and seen, and the traditions are felt to which it has given birth, none will stand in need of an apology from us. What has now become known as Mulki or Deccani sentiment is in essence our pride in our past and our determination to defend and strengthen ourselves by our own exertions. It will explain the existence of that quality, something more than mere local patriotism, or State-consciousness, which, far more than in any other Indian State, you will find influencing our thoughts and ambitions, and no student of our history, or our politics could arrive at a true appraisal of the forces at work without appreciation and sense of that perspective. The sentiment does not come in the way of others, it only asks for internal development on the lines of our own genius, it therefore naturally resents interference by outside elements which have not solved their own problems and have, therefore, nothing to teach beyond what we may ourselves, in accordance with our needs, choose to learn or adopt of their best. It is not mere isolationism or the assertion of a kind of Monroe doctrine which we have seen buried in our own days in the very place of its birth. The independence of Nizam ul-Mulk did not come in the way of his marching to the defence of Delhi against an Iranian invader, and to-day the armed forces of his seventh successor are fighting against an even greater menace to the integrity of India. They signify the bonds which unite us with the rest of India, and the homage we pay to the continuance of the unity of Indian History."

Thus materials for the study of the modern phase of Deccan History are profuse. There are heaps of documents preserved in the record offices at various places and in the private collection of those families whose ancestors played important part in government and politics. The international rivalries which affected the fortunes of the British in India have been reflected in the 18th and 19th centuries in the tremendous repercussions of the course of contemporary history. The effects of western education and culture have also to be studied. For the Deccan History sources embodied in Marāṭha, Telgu, Tamil and Kannada records are especially valuable. A word may be put in here for the successful operation of the new plan of Regional Surveys of Records formulated by the Indian Historical Records Commission which can be utilised to enrich the materials for the study of the history of every region.

Schemes of histories of various provinces and cultural zones of the country may be regarded as being both supplementary to and accelerating of, the progress of an All-India scheme for a comprehensive history of the land, on which the Indian History Congress has embarked with much encouraging success, in as much as they will give a clearer idea of what might be involved in national effort and make available for it a body of experienced historians who have accomplished a similar task. Thus the project of the History of the Deccan which has been started under the auspices of the Government of His Exalted Highness the Nizam and entrusted to the competent hands of Mr Yazdani and his colleagues, deserves high commendation, because to the work have been harnessed the abilities and research fruits of distinguished scholars.

The new school of Modern Indian Historiography that is developing has naturally been claiming attention at the hands of public authorities and soliciting help from them for the increased availability of the records and of their contents and also for the starting of historical institutes and conferences as part of their necessary equipment and as clearing houses and mutual exchange organs of such material. These functions can be best conducted in permanent or quasi-permanent institutions of scholars expert in calendaring and sifting work and also capable of correct interpretation of material and working in co-operation with bodies like the Indian Historical Records Commission and the Indian History Congress. The Deccan History Conference will, we are sure, serve as an effective instrument for such co-operation and collaboration, and we wish it a long and glorious career of increasing usefulness.

RECONSTRUCTION OF THE MARATHA-NIZAM RELATIONS.

RAO BAHADUR G S SARDESAI, KAMSHET.

I CANNOT too highly commend the inauguration of a Deccan History Conference at Hyderabad. Nor do I consider it to have been planned too soon. The Deccan indeed forms a distinct geographical unit of this Indian Continent, separated from the northern lands by the river Narmada. The peninsular region between this river and the Indian ocean has been known as the Deccan, of which Maharashtra or the Maratha Country is certainly the most important for our immediate concerns. The name Maharashtra which has corrupted into Maratha, has been in use since ancient times, where the Prakrit language Mahāśāstrī was spoken, having a rich literature of its own, which gave rise to our present day Marathi. A distinct historical and clearly dated mention of the Maharashtra country occurs in the Aihole (near Badami) inscription executed by the famous Chalukya monarch Satyashraya-Pulakeshi (A C 608—642), who is therein recorded as having taken possession of the Mahāśāstrī country in the year 634. That country then contained 99000 villages and was divided into three distinct parts, -Vidarbha (Berar), Ashmaka (or the Baglan country of the north Godavary valley) and Kuntala, south of the Krishna, now known as the southern Maratha country.¹ These three different units practically retain to this day their former extent and political character, i.e. Berar now included in C. P., the Maratha districts of the Bombay Presidency and the Marathwada of the Nizam's Dominions. These artificial divisions introduced and perpetuated by the freaks of politics ought not to blind us to their essential unity in worldly interests and practical life.

In order to satisfy the needs of historical research and advancement of scholarship, a separate institution has long been a necessity which a self contained centre of learning like the Osmania University and the patronage of a powerful State like that of the Nizam's Dominions could alone satisfy. The University of Bombay for obvious reasons could never undertake this function. The Bharat Itihas Mandal of Poona and the Rajwade Research Institute of Dhulia have all along been too poor, too exclusive and too parochial in their outlook to look after the growing needs of a wider and comprehensive research all round, nor can the modern History Congress, nor the Bhandarkar Institute of Poona concentrate on the history of the Deccan proper, taking account of the varied and immense mass of materials that are available not only in old documents, but in local inscriptions, coins and relics and works of art and architecture, in which this land abounds and which invite patient and immediate attention in order to preserve them from permanent loss or ruin. These Deccan lands have had many seats of learning and famous capitals such as Daulatabad, Sind-Khed, Paithan, Kalyani, Bidar, Gulbarga, Malkhed, Hampi, Anagondi, with forts, temples, shrines and mosques, not to mention a large number of other historical places ancient and modern. This wealth of monuments and inscriptions, of buried coins and perishing papers, deserves to be immediately saved and brought into use, as it will afford ample scope for scholarly labours being devoted to all the three periods of our history, ancient, medieval and modern. For such a task an independent body fostered by a State, which few realize is larger than the Presidency of Bombay, was vitally needed, and I sincerely hope its operations would be conducted in a broad Catholic spirit so as to satisfy all points of view and all shades of national scholarship.

2. The 18th Century History.

My personal experience is, as you well know, confined to the Maratha period only, that is to say, roughly to the two centuries 17th and 18th. I have ever regretted my ignorance of Persian and have concentrated my labours mainly on Maratha sources. The history of the Marathas has, in my opinion, two essential characteristics, (1) it is the most recent indigenous experiment in nation-building activities in India, and secondly, it offers to its votaries an enormous mass of published materials. Workers in the Bombay Presidency know that there are no less than at least five hundred printed volumes of Marathi sources, — each containing about 500 pages. This collection owes its existence to the selfless labours of several Maratha scholars, and if I have to offer any lesson to your conference at Hyderabad, I would immediately recommend this example of Mahatashtra for imitation by your students of the Osmania University, earnestly scouring all your rich and vast regions and bringing together the uncared for materials that are certainly lying about in heaps.

The eighteenth century history of the Deccan is mainly made up by the Muslim-Maratha struggle, commencing with the death of Aurangzeb, and ending with the fall of the last Peshwa. This period bristles in battles and campaigns, victories and defeats, hostilities and friendships, but always a close contact between the two powers, the Peshwas of Poona and the Nizams of Hyderabad. The whole theme centres round the relations of these two rivals. The Peshwas' family produced several capable members in quick succession, whose short life presents a remarkable contrast to the longevity of the two main figures of the Asaf Jahi dynasty, Asaf Jah himself and his son Nizam Ali. Those two witnessed not less than seven individuals occupying the Peshwa's seat at Poona. The contest between these two assumed curious and delicate forms at different times. Indeed when the rising Peshwas inflicted repeated blows upon Asaf Jah and his descendants, it was commonly believed that Marathas would soon eradicate Muslim rule from the South. But in the end history disclosed a wonderful phenomenon. It is the line of Asaf Jah today which holds the major portion of the Maharashtra lands, while even the name of the Peshwa is practically forgotten. Tenacity has won over shortlived brilliance. I for myself do not feel at all distressed at this result, it is immaterial whether a particular line of rulers succeeds or fails. What is of essence is how the cooperative will of the two races works jointly for this nation's destiny, when both are being held in equal subjection to a foreign power, having long ago lost their liberties. The point is what use we make of our past history, to make or mar the future. To me the immediate task is clear.

3. The Archives of Hyderabad.

It is within your knowledge that through my instrumentality the Government of Bombay had the records of the Peshwas' Daftar fully explored with the result that some 8000 pages of historical material out of an incalculable mass of several crores, have been published. While going through this enormous mass I was every moment conscious of something wanting, something incomplete. After all Poona possessed, I felt, only a half of the enacted story, may be perhaps the major half, but the other half was certainly missing. If the history was acted jointly by the two powers, the archives of both must be laid under contribution if complete and accurate narrative of past events is to be evolved, and in consequence if the Poona records after a long effort have seen the light of day, the possessions of the sister power of Hyderabad must be equally made available for the scrutiny of scholars. This subject has all along kept me constantly alert and restless as I went on publishing only one-sided version in my Riyasat volumes. At the annual session of the Historical Records Commission I happened to cultivate the acquaintance of Mr. Khurshid Ali, the retired Director of the Hyderabad Record Office. He very kindly invited me in January 1937 to be his guest and allowed me to see the few bundles of Marathi papers which he had on hand. I worked there for a week, but regretted not to have found anything tangible for my purpose. But what little I saw certainly roused my curiosity and expectations. Fortunately I came across another enthusiastic figure in Hyderabad, full of talent, judgement and driving force, I mean the President of your Association, Nawab Ali Yavar Jung, whose first acquaintance I happened to make when as a Professor of your University he came to inspect the Persian Records at Poona, while I was then editing the Marathi selections. He has, as we all know, acquired unique experience in life and travel and contacted various eminent personalities in the course of his official duties. He has thus been able to acquire a singular grasp of Indian politics and India's immediate needs. We have freely exchanged our views when opportunities presented. He has rightly judged that through history alone would come the solution of our ills. He has been assiduously developing this idea in the midst of the heavy preoccupations involved in his official duties. He has been working to bring about a healthy spirit of research, progress, and unity, not allowing Hyderabad to be outstripped by the advancing world outside.

During little more than a month that I spent at the Record Office of Hyderabad in January and February, I found some very precious historical material bearing on the joint history of the Maratha-Nizam relations. More than five lacs of papers have so far been brought together and a much larger amount can be recovered if a persistent effort can be made. In the Poona Records news-letters were discovered in plenty sent by Maratha agents stationed at the Court of the Nizam, similarly your Daftar-e-Diwan contains numerous news-letters sent by the Nizam's agents stationed at Poona and other places. They often contain valuable information acquired by secret agents employed by the Hyderabad Government at the Maratha capital. These news-letters are couched in a language which although written in the Modi script, is a curious blend of Urdu and Marathi. A singular chronicle written in old Modi is discovered at the Osmania University, which contains 143 pages written by some Hyderabad agent and describing the doings of the Maratha rulers at Poona. This chronicle is indeed a rare find, as I now see, that a few stray leaves of the same work were discovered and printed at Poona about thirty years ago. I am sanguine that more copies of this chronicle would be discovered if a thorough search were made, so as to replace the first 17 pages and those after 143 which this present copy has lost. It will thus be realized how a joint and earnest effort in research is immediately necessary. It is sure to enrich our joint history.

4. Muslim genius for History.

As a life-long labourer in the field of history, I have imbibed in my mental make up several imperishable facts of our joint Hindu and Muslim situation during nearly a millenium of our mutual contact, a record of which is a precious legacy of both. Compared to the achievements of the Muslims, the Marathas pale into dismal insignificance. The Muslims have all along been a proud and valient race. In the world's record there is hardly any other line of such brilliant and capable rulers as the six grand figures of the Mughal Empire. Not only did they change the political face of India, but we Hindus cut a very sorry figure even in the recorded story of our past life. I spoke above of a large number of printed volumes of Marathi materials, but let me assure you that they are all mostly third rate compositions, with hardly any original state documents or statesmen's despatches. They are mostly bakhars and news-letters, in no way comparable to such eminent Persian works as the history of Ferishta, the Memoirs of Babar, the autobiography of Jahangir, or the several official records of those great rulers, like that of Khwafikhan, for instance. The Hindus can't boast of a single production that can even stand distant comparison with Abul Fazl's Ain e-Akbari, a veritable mine of invaluable information on the many-sided activities of the Mughal State and society of the period. In fact in point of history the Muslims are our great teachers. The Hindus have nothing to show in comparison, beyond one solitary instance of the Rajatarangini, an old Sanskrit poem recording the history of the rulers of Kashmere. Even this is not of a very high order. It is only recently that the Hindus are reconstituting their glorious past out of scrappy and scattered evidence. A proper sense of time and place is the very soul of history to which Muslim writers as a rule have done due justice, while even most important letters and despatches of the Peshwas themselves, hardly bear any date, and if at all a date is mentioned, it is invariably without a mention of the year. Our most trying difficulty in editing Marathi papers including those of the Peshwas' Daftar also, arose from this absence of dates, or the names of writers and the addressees. Even the origin of the two prominent Hindu eras, the Samvat and the Shak, is still shrouded in mystery. We don't know the date of our great poet Kalidas. One need not wonder, therefore, if a serious controversy has raged in Maharashtra over the correct birth-date of their great hero Shivaji. Contrast this with the correct dates and details we obtain in Muslim works not only about the numerous progeny of the Emperors themselves, but of most of the events connected with their life's work. Indeed the Muslims exhibit a remarkable genius for history.

5. Cooperation the Crying need.

Gentlemen, we human beings are always imperfect, along with some strong points we possess glaring weaknesses also. A nation can lead a successful life only when all its members are ready to complement each other, to have a free give and take policy between them. If we refuse to cooperate, we are undone. At this moment, I feel, we have fallen on evil times. Instead of putting our shoulders jointly to the wheel for our all-round national uplift, we are wasting our energy, both of us, in narrow selfish squabbles. The military life of the camp which the Muslims long practised in India and outside, and which the Hindus ceased during centuries to experience, has now been denied to both, with the result that we both have lost the healthy mutual comradeship and discipline, upon which success in life so vitally depends. Loss of liberty has made both races effete and blind to the call of their national duty. The other day when I was hospitably received and shown round the grand edifices of the Osmania University, its exquisite workmanship and decorative taste, the splendid halls, the gorgeous library, the sumptuous hostels, my mind inwardly travelled to the poor conditions of the colleges of Poona, but this poverty, I thought, engendered a keen competition in scholarship, the vivacious brain of Poona ever restless for research and advancement, I am sorry I missed in the grandeur of Hyderabad. You must bear with me, friends, for my outspoken remarks. 'I have reached a stage in life where I have nothing to gain or lose by uttering a false cry. I here express my genuine sentiments.' 'I have ever been a great admirer of the strong sense of brotherhood and equality which the Muslims as a race have exhibited through historic ages. Let the two great races heartily cooperate and make up each other's defects in the service of their common Motherland and the future is sure to be as bright and prosperous as they both would wish. This is the crying need of the moment.

6. Specific Tasks before us.

In this vein of thought, allow me gentlemen, to conclude my remarks by pointing out what appear to me some of the specific tasks that lie before this conference for immediate execution if our mutual history is to be reconstructed

1. All available materials, now lying scattered through these extensive dominions, pertaining to all the languages which they embrace, Sanskrit, Marathi, Kanarese, Telegu as well as Persian, should be at once brought together and made available for fresh research, the University taking charge of them for explorative purposes

2. A complete set of published materials in all these five languages must be immediately provided as the only means of further study

3 A dictionary of biography of all historical characters occurring in these languages is an urgent necessity for a research worker. Buckland's dictionary of Anglo-Indian names should serve as a model.

4 The five languages mentioned above, being the mother-tongues of the various communities which constitute the populations of this State, should have equal and unhampered opportunity for study and development, special encouragement being offered to those students who know all or as many of these languages as possible. The world is fast driving towards such an ideal of equality for all races, wherein no suppression is possible. Thus alone can the needs of a genuine history come to be fulfilled.

5 So far as the history of the Asaf Jah and his immediate successors is concerned, the plentiful materials available in Marathi should be immediately calendered in English so as to awaken further research in other languages.

6 Similarly, Persian Documents of historical import in the State archives should be carefully arranged, classified and calendered in English. Their publication is vitally necessary for the study of history in all the Universities of India. The copies of the Imperial Sanads, granting Chauthai and Sardeshmukhi to the Marathas, must be looked for in these records and made available for study.

In conclusion let me express my hearty and grateful thanks to the Government of His Exalted Highness for allowing me an opportunity to examine their records and a share to cooperate in their labours towards a common evolution of historical results

A Modi Bakhar at the Osmania University.

BY

RAO BAHADUR G S SARDESAI, KAMSHET

WHEN I paid a visit to the Osmania University on 18th February I discovered there a Modi Ms book containing 143 pages, and being curious to know what it was about, I borrowed the piece from the Library and studied it leisurely at the Guest House where I was staying. The document is written in a fine Modi hand, possibly by two or three different writers. It is a chronicle of events describing the regimes of the Peshwas, commencing with the last days of Aurangzeb and ending with happenings at Poona in the year 1779. Unfortunately the first 17 pages and those after 143 are lost. The paper used is old brown thick Daulatabadi. An attempt is made to write the incidents in a chronological order, using the Fashi era, but some of the dates mentioned are evidently incorrect.

The writer seems to be well acquainted with the details of Nawab Nizam Ali Khan's regime, most of the important events of the Peshwa's regime are briefly narrated but some three or four events are graphically described to some of which the writer appears to be a personal witness, e.g. the murder of Haider Jung (Bussy's Secretary), the imprisonment of Salabat Jung and the assumption of power by Nizam Ali Khan form an affair which is described with circumstantial detail on pp 77-91. A few other important features of this document are

1. The services of Balaji Vishwanath to Raja Shahu when he was a prisoner in Aurangzeb's camp and when this shrewd diplomat exercised backdoor influences to promote Shahu's interests by paying secret visits to Aurangzeb's daughter Zinat-un-nisa Begam. This rise of Balaji Vishwanath occupies some 14 pages (18-32).
2. The circumstantial details mentioned herein about the battle of Rakshasbhuvan (1763) in which Vithal Sundar was killed are equally graphic and probably witnessed personally by the writer.
3. The murder of the Peshwa Narayan Rao at Poona is also described of which a few minute details here presented are nowhere else available (pp. 119-131).

On p 141 there occurs a significant statement to this effect. "The Nawab Nizam Ali Khan despatched presents of dress and jewellery to the newly born Peshwa Sawai Madhavrao with Nanaji Shankar and Haibatrao Gopal. When Nanaji returned to Hyderabad, he left Haibat Rao Gopal at Poona to send here daily reports of important happenings at Poona." Nanaji Shankar is a member of the Rai Rayan family, whose career is known to extend from 1730 to 1785. His clerk Haibat Rao Gopal, father of Raghunath Rao, was a competent Akhbar-nawis, knowing Persian well and writing a good Modi hand. During my stay here for a month I have read a large number of news-letters from the pen of this Haibat Rao Gopal, who acted almost as the important agent of Hyderabad, stationed at the Court of Poona during that critical period of the Peshwa-Nizam relations which came to be disturbed by the murder of Narayan Rao. Raghunath Rao the murdered Peshwa's uncle courted Nizam Ali's support to his cause, but when a son came to be born to the wife of the murdered Peshwa, the Poona ministry sought Nizam Ali Khan's recognition for the installation of this new Peshwa. It is well known that Nizam Ali Khan rendered a great good service to the Marathas by supporting the cause of the Barbhais against the mischievous move of Raghunath Rao in seeking British support and thus giving rise to the first Maratha-British war. The plentiful Akhbarat despatched from Poona by Haibat Rao Gopal are eloquent and shed fresh light on the grand happenings in Indian History during the decade from the death of the Peshwa Madhava Rao I and the Treaty of Salbai (1772-1782).

If this newly discovered bakhar is from the pen of Haibat Rao as I surmise it is, it is possible that a copy of it and possibly a complete one may be discovered in the Marathi records of the Rai Rayan family which are at present being investigated. I should therefore emphatically advise that a thorough search should be made for a copy of this bakhar both here in the Daftar-e-Diwani and outside.

I saw Prof C. N. Joshi, M. A., who brought this bakhar to the Osmania University. He told me that he obtained it from one Maink Ganesh Kendrekar of Sanpuri in the Paibhani District. (A clerk of Mr. Vaman Naik living in a neighbouring village brought the bakhar to Prof. Joshi when he had visited Sanpuri sometime ago) I think if a careful search could be made in those places and the region round about, a copy of this bakhar may come to be traced.

In any case the present copy requires being at once renovated, as the pages are fast crumbling. It should then be copied and published with suitable calendars of important portions in the selections of Marathi historical pages which I suppose the Government of His Exalted Highness is going to undertake. This bakhar and the Akbarats will indeed form an important contribution to Maratha-Nizam history and certainly bring great credit to the Nizam's Government.

Shaha's Letter to Nizam-ul-mulk Asaf Jah relating to Sidi Sat (A. D. 1735)

BY

DR. A G Pawar, M A., LL B. (Bom) Ph D (London)
Bar-at-Law, Kolhapur

THERE were very few political events in which king Shahu personally took such keen interest as he did in his campaigns against the Sidis of Janjira. The Sidi-Maratha war dragged on for three years, from 1733 to 1736, and, in the end, brought but small gains to the Marathas. Sidi Sat was a notable figure on the side of the Sidis who, with their naturally strong island fortresses, defied for long the combined forces of the Maratha generals. In 1735, Sidi Sat suddenly fell on Bankot, destroyed the fort, and devastated a part of the neighbouring coastal tract¹. But when he was hard pressed by the pursuing army of the Marathas he gave out that he would leave just a few vessels at Bankot and proceed towards Surat.²

A very large number of letters giving minutest details of the operations carried on by the Marathas, and of the actions fought between them and the forces of the Sidis, are given in Vols. 3 and 33 of the Selections from the Peshwa Daftar. But a very important engagement between Sidi Sat and the Marathas which lasted for five days and which all but ruined the Sidi does not appear to have been mentioned in the letters which have been included in the above mentioned two volumes.

British Museum Additional 26,606 contains an English translation of a letter written by Shahu to Nizam-ul-Mulk Asaf Jah. Unfortunately, the translation is not quite satisfactory. But the meaning of the letter is quite clear and one can judge the importance of this letter when one reads it in the context of other available papers bearing on this topic. It definitely adds to our knowledge of the Maratha campaigns. It shows the work done by the Maratha general, Udaji Pawar, and it gives the news that Bakaji Mahadik, "the Sudai of Armada", and a prominent figure on the side of the Marathas, was killed in this action. It further shows to what straits Sidi Sat was reduced before he was killed in his battle with Chimaji Appa on April 19, 1736.⁴

4 Idem Vol 3 Letter No 192 which gives an account of this battle and which was written by Chimaji Appa in his own hand,

Why Shahu found it necessary to write to Nizam ul-Mulk Asaf Jah about Sidi Sat is mentioned in the letter itself. The Sidi, pursued by the Marathas, intended to retire to Surat, and the Mughal Governor of Surat was to be asked to prevent the Sidi from landing at that port. Shahu wished that the Nizam should write to the Governor to that purpose. Here, apparently, Shahu was either misinformed or ignorant of the facts. The Nizam had, from the very beginning of the Sidi-Maratha war, taken great interest in the fortunes of the Sidis, had in particular, shown personal favour to Sidi Sat, and it was expected that he would actively help the Sidis.⁵ In such circumstances, it was too much to expect the Nizam to take any hostile measure against Sidi Sat.

Shahu's letter, unfortunately, like many such papers, bears no date. But when read along with other letters relating to this episode, it appears to have been written towards the end of 1735.

The text⁶ of the English translation of the letter is as follows—

“From Shahoo Mahataj to Nizamool Moolk

Your letter has arrived and I was extremely pleased.

Seedee Sad having fled from the thanah of Mahar⁷ went to Rajpooree, but the Zungees not allowing him to land on the island, he departed and went to Bancoot, which is on the coast near Rajpooree, at the time when Oodajee Poor⁸ arrived, having taken five gallivats⁹ he sailed away. I have heard that he was going to the Bundar of Surat. As soon as the army of Oodajee Poor arrived after him, he exerted himself for five days, and storming the fort on all sides, the Sepoys carried it. The inhabitants, fearful of their lives, fled on board the gallivats, gurabs, hoorees which were without anchors and apparatus, many of which sank from extreme weight and many people were killed, and of them there did not remain one sign. And on my side Buggajee Madik,¹⁰ the Sirdar of Aimada, was killed by a ball from a Jazael, and forty men were killed and seventy wounded. Oodajee Poor having taken a large army is pursuing Sedee Sad by land. Wherever that ill-fortuned may go, there he will follow. You enjoin the Foudar of the above-mentioned Bundar not to allow that rascal Sedee Sad to come there. From his coming all the Bundar will be deserted and destroyed.”

Nawab Umdat-ul-Omrah and the Court of the Recorder at Madras.

BY

K. SAJANN LAL, M. A., F. R. S. A.

BEFORE the year 1798, justice was administered at Madras by a Court of a Mayor and nine Aldermen, from which appeal lay to the Governor-in-Council. This arrangement continued to exist at Madras and Bombay much longer than at Bengal. A new Charter was granted which was published at Madras on 1st November, 1798. The Recorder's Court superseded the Mayor's Court. The records of the old Court became the records of the new Court. In place of a Mayor and nine Aldermen, the Court of the Recorder had a Recorder presiding over and three Aldermen. It determined not to have Pandits and Maulvis as referees in Hindu and Muhammadan Law but rather to trust other sources of information.¹

The levying of the money by European adventurers to Native Princes on exorbitant terms had long produced grave scandals in some of which Paul Benham was notoriously involved. Burke in one of his brilliant speeches exposed those scandals and cited the case of the Nawab of Arcot. That is why the Act of 1797, laid down an important provision which prohibits under severe penalties unauthorised loans by British subjects to the Native Princes of India.²

In this connection a letter written to the Nawab of Carnatic by John Whitehill, the Governor of Madras, regarding transactions of this nature is worth quoting.³

"May it please Your Highness,

I have the honour to transmit to your Highness, an extract of the Company's letter to this Government dated 6th June last, which I recommend to your attention. Your Highness will particularly observe how strictly they have forbid their servants and others under their protection from lending money to any of the Country Powers in India, or Persons holding Commissions under them to be repaid at a future period on Mortgages or Monetary transactions also figured in the Recorder's Court.

With this short introductory note on the Madras Recorder, I will proceed with a few cases that came before it

Let us take the case, entitled "A corrupt Durbar Transaction," which was discussed at great length by this Court on 4th March and 30th April 1799. The facts of the case if shorn of its legal terminology are as follows.—

The Government of Madras having in 1779 taken possession of the Guntur Circar, Mr Johnson being at that time a Member of the Council, overtures were made to him by the then Nawab, through the mediation of one Bhagvanloo, that if he would in Council promote the Nawab's interest of obtaining possession of the Circar, he would give him 50,000 Pagodas, that this being agreed to by Johnson, a bond was given by the Nawab for the money, which not being paid, was renewed and renewed again. In order to conceal the name of the Counciller, from such a transaction it was renewed in the name of Douglass This case was dismissed.

1. The second case discusses whether a person in the service of the Nawab was entitled to privilege? Col Thomas Barrett was served with a summon to appear on the 4th March. He filed an affidavit to the effect that he was the servant of the Nawab and was not concerned with trade⁴ He obtained a rule to show cause why the proceedings should not be set aside on the ground of privilege. He produced a certificate from the Nawab, which was in Persian and proved as to the signature, by an affidavit sworn to by John Battley, the Nawab's Persian Translator.

This Certificate gives us an idea to what extent Nawab Umdat-ul-Omarah reposed confidence in Col Barrett. It reads —

"To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting We Omdat-ul-Omarah Wala Jah, Nawab of the Carnatic etc., do hereby certify, that Col Thomas Barrett, inhabitant of Madras, has been upwards of 9 years last past, and is now really and truly retained in our service, and is now hath, for the space of 3 years upwards, been our principal confidential Secretary, and English Interpreter in the Affairs of our Government with the Honourable The United East India Company and others, with whom we have concerns and that he hath for such length of time and doth now actually perform the duties of such joint offices, and hath and doth receive from us a monthly Stipend, or salary, for the discharge thereof And that his long, able, and faithful service, as well as knowledge of our private and public transactions render his Continuance in those character of the utmost importance to us, and our Affairs Given under our hand the 24th day of Ramzan 1213 Hijry, corresponding with the 2nd Day of March, 1799⁵

Thomas Barrett's plea filed on 6th April though lengthy but it is interesting to note how again and again, Barrett tried to prove that his Master Nawab Umdat-ul-Omarah was a sovereign power and as such independent. In other words his plea shows with what zeal and interest he emphasised the treaty rights of the Nawab. A few extracts are given here —

"Thomas Barrett further says that the Nawabs of the Carnatic have been and still are acknowledged, recognised, and treated with as independent Sovereign Princes, as well by all the Native Powers in India, as by the Crown of Great Britain, and other Sovereign Powers in Europe and elsewhere, and also by the said United Company, acting under the liberties and privileges delegated, and given to them aforesaid And the said Nawabs of the Carnatic for the time being, and His present Highness Umdat-ul-Omarah Bahadur, etc, the rightful and lawful Nawab of the Carnatic, and such, a sovereign independent Prince (not being a Christian) now holds and enjoys large territorial possessions within the places of the trade of the said United Company, and particularly in the Carnatic, over which the said Nawab has, and continues to exercise, sovereign power and authority And the said Thomas Barrett, further says "That His Highness Umdat-ul-Omarah Bahadur etc has been, for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of three years last, and upwards, and now is, the rightful and lawful Nawab of the Carnatic, and during the whole of that time has exercised and continues to exercise sovereignty, over the territorial possessions and dominions belonging to him as Nawab of the Carnatic, as aforesaid etc ”⁶

What a strange coincidence? These very feelings, if I am permitted to say, have been expressed by Prof C S Srinivasachari when we read ‘The following picture of the Nawab is an attempt to evaluate his views as to the effect of the British connection with his Government and state and reveal his ever-growing fear of an early extinction of the Carnatic State, and the stress is laid on the Nawab’s maintenance of his rights as secured by treaties and his clinging to them with a vague, but despairing hope that they might be observed in his favour and lead to his State’s survival”

There are other cases pertaining in some way or other to the Carnatic State such as that of Qadir Nawaz Khan.

This was an ejectment brought to recover possession of a house in the village of Poodoopankum, within the limits of Madras, which had been mortgaged to the lessors of the plaintiff by Qadir Nawaz Khan, the tenant in possession. Having been served with the usual notice to defend, he took the earliest opportunity of submitting to the Court his claim to have the proceeding set aside, grounded upon an affidavit in which he described himself as an attendant and servant of Nawab Umdat-ul Omarah. He also produced a certificate to that effect. He stated that the residence of the Nawab was at Chepauk House within a mile of Fort St George “for the purpose of the more easily connecting his (Nawab’s) business in person with his Ally the Honorable English East India Company, instead of employing an ambassador or resident for that purpose.” “That he the deponent was and had been ever since the accession of the Nawab to the musnad, the Lord Steward or manager of this Court, and was on that station under the necessity of attending, and that in fact he did attend daily at the durbar, and was essential to His Highness’ service state dignity.” The case was discussed at great length and it was insisted in reply that a prince coming into the dominions of another with the consent of the local government, for the purpose of conducting his affairs, was entitled to all the privileges of an ambassador. If a sovereign chooses to be his own ambassador it is competent to him to be so, and the consequence follows; he is entitled to exemption from process and so are his servants, while his functions continue

Another case refers to the grain delivery by the Nawab in discharge of a war subsidy under a particular treaty (1797).

There are other cases of equally great interest decided by the Court of the Recorder at Madras.

Rao Bahadur Professor C. S. Srinivasachari has given a good character sketch of Umdat-ul-Omarah. He refers to a letter which the Madras Council wrote to the Company as early as 4th July 1775, wherein they expressed their fear "that the Nawab might try to alter the succession in favour of his second son Amir-ul-Omarah, whom he had entrusted with much power"

Indeed, 3 months earlier, Alexander Wynch, the Governor of Madras wrote a letter to the Nawab, wherein he expressed grave concern over Amir-ul-Omarah's being entrusted with too much power. His letter reads as follows⁸ —

"May it please Your Highness

Having received information that Your Highness has given or intends to give, the charge of the Fort and country of Tanjore, to His Excellency Ummeer-ul-Umarah the Duty I owe to the Company, and the interest I take in everything, which relates to the welfare of Your Highness and the Carnatic, induces me to point out to Your Highness, that it is a General Maxim in Politics, not to put too much Power into the hands of any one subject, and I am therefore to request that Your Highness will not in addition to what Ummeer-ul-Umarah already professes, namely the Command of Your Highness' numerous Forces and the Collector of the Trichinopoly Revenues put into his hands the collection of the considerable revenues of Tanjore or the charge of the Fort and Garrison of that Kingdom.

As the Government has ever since the commencement of the convention between Your Highness and the Company manifested the Most ardent desire, of promoting the power and welfare of Your Highness and as it has no other wish in this than to induce you to act in the manner which may be consistent with the security of the Carnatic and of the Company's possessions which are so nearly connected with each other

8. This sealed letter and many other important documents, Firmans, the Will of Umdat ul Omarah Maulvi's Fatwas, are found in the Saeed Library. The writer gratefully acknowledges his thanks to Mr. Ghouse Mohammed, for kindly permitting him to use some of these documents.

I flatter myself that Your Highness will excuse the freedom of this Representation and Most humble servant

The very same year when the Madras Recorder was superseded by the Supreme Court, Umdat-ul-Omarah died (15th July 1801) There arose a crop of litigation where the Court had to decide such questions

How far a member of the Nawab's family is entitled to privileges? Whether an illegitimate nephew, not living with him, is entitled to be considered for this purpose as one of the family? Whether the Nawab could be considered as a sovereign, entitled to the rights of an ambassador? Whether any member of this family could take advantage of them?

The object of writing this article is to bring to the notice of scholars, the important material looked up in the offices and records of the various Courts. The Saeedia Library possesses invaluable material specially dealing with the Nawabs of Arcot which should be tapped by scholars

Nizam Ali Khan and the Blank Farman

BY

K SAJUN LAL, M A, F. R S A (HYDERABAD DECCAN)

AFTER the defeats suffered by the confederate army of Haidar Ali and Nizam Ali Khan at Changama and Timomali, the Calcutta and Madras Governments seriously considered the proposal of dethroning Nizam Ali Khan¹ Mr. Verelst contemplated a measure as regards the dethronement of Nizam Ali Khan, which reads somewhat strangely today. The facts are that Nizam Ali Khan had rather proved refractory. He had joined Haidar Ali in his war against the English at Madras. Therefore Verelst proposed to punish him and wanted to set up another candidate as the Subedar of the Deccan.

Verelst procured a grant from the Mughal Emperor. The name of the person to whom the grant was to be made was left blank. The English Government at Madras were told to depose Nizam Ali Khan and set up another in his place. They were at liberty to fill up the blank in the grant with the name of a new Nizam. This measure is fully explained in the following extract from a general letter.

"By letters sometime since received from the gentlemen at Madras, it appears that they had laboured under great difficulties on the nomination of a Subah to the Moghul province of the Deccan, in case Nizam Ali should by an obstinate perseverance in his unjust measures oblige them to deprive him of his government and they were even pleased to request our opinion in a matter of so great importance. We expressed ourselves with that unreserved freedom which we wish may mutually subsist between the two Presidencies and judging it expedient to secure the King's Firman for the nomination of some other person, our President was desired to apply for the same to His Majesty who has been pleased to comply with the request, and in a letter lately received from him, he promised to despatch a blank firman within five days of the date thereof to be filled with the name of any person, we may judge most proper, for the security and lasting tranquility of your possession on the coast. This is a power we should be loth to avail ourselves of, excepting in the case of the utmost necessity, and such we fear this will prove, if we can form our judgement from the present situation of affairs."²

1. For details read Prof. N. K. Sinha's article "A blank Farman" published in the proceedings of the Indian Historical Record's commission, pp. 31-34.

2. J. Talboys and Wheeler, "Early Records of British India," p. 83.

The Madras Government which too had a hand in mooted this proposal, fortunately, had to think twice before acting. Better judgement prevailed and they openly flouted Verelst's order, when circumstances changed. In fact their judgement proved more sound. Later on the Board of Directors too approved their policy and condemned in strong terms Verelst's measure as contrary to their policy. Therefore they ordered the firman to be cancelled.

The Court of Directors characterised this proposal as "wild" and observed, 'Much has been wrote from you and our servants in Bengal on the necessity of checking the Marathas which may in some degree be proper, but it is not for the English East India Company to take the part of the umpire in Indostan. If it had not been for the imprudent measure you have taken, the country powers would have formed a balance of power amongst themselves and their quarrels would have left you at peace'.¹

But Verelst was so convinced of the expediency of this measure that a year afterwards, he expressed his regret that it had not been put into practice. He opined thus —

"I could have wished the gentlemen on the coast had been more deeply impressed with this idea, so that the reinforcements sent from Bengal instead of being scattered and dismembered might have struck the important blow we meditated against the Suba. In this case Hyderabad, weak and defenceless, must have fallen an easy prey before the Nizam could have even received intelligence of the expedition, and as the capture must have been more universally enforced a conviction of our power to the dangerous restitution of it to a repenting enemy must have highly exalted our moderation and disinterestedness".²

This speaks for itself.

Some unpublished letters of Shah Nawaz Khan Samsamud Daulah

BY

DR. YUSUF HUSAIN, D LITT. HYDERABAD-DN.

THE object of this paper is to bring to light some of the unpublished and rare letters of Shah Nawaz Khan Samsamud Daulah, the great scholar-statesman of the Deccan. Samsamud Daulah, the minister of Nasir Jung and later Wakil e-Mutlaq of Salabat Jang is equally famous as the author of Maasir-ul-Umara, the valuable and voluminous biographical dictionary of Mughal peerage. He was a first class literary stylist. Hence the importance of the collection of his letters both on account of his high political and literary position.

The collection of his letters in the Persian Manuscript Section of the Asafia Library contains valuable information regarding the contemporary political events. One Manuscript copy of the letters or Makatib is casually attached to 'Insha-e-Musavi Khan,' Number 201, (Insha), and the other is equally casually attached to the Manuscript copy of 'Baharistan-e-Sukhan,' Number 193 (Tazkira), without any specific mention of the Makatib either in the catalogue or in the Manuscript volumes themselves. ~~Examination of~~ both the copies of the Makatib and found them practically identical except for some slight verbal differences.

The collection consists of Shah Nawaz Khan's official and private correspondence which covers a pretty long and historically important period in the history of the Deccan. As some of the letters and petitions are addressed to such personalities as Alamgir II, the Mughal Emperor, Nasir Jung, Peshwa Balaji Rao, Syed Lashkar Khan, Malhar Rao Holkar and Dupleix, they are historically of great value.

The letters and petitions are of varying length. Some of them bear sub-titles indicative of the subject treated therein. The collection contains 66 letters and petitions in all as detailed below —

11.	to Dilawar Khan Bahadur
11	to Mir Ghulam Ali Azad
2	to Mir Muhammad Husain Khan
1	to Syed Ghulam Hasan
1.	to Muhammad Aslam Khan

The English translation of two of these letters along with their historical interpretation is given below —

The petition addressed to Alamgir II, the Mughal Emperor runs thus —

“Abdul Razzaq¹ who considers himself to be smaller than the atoms of dust, prostrates his forehead of devotion and begs access to touch the foot of the royal throne. The Royal Farman, accompanied by a special writ and gifts, has honoured the devoted servant beyond description. The happy news that one's desire shall find fulfilment, has opened the doors of felicity to hope. It is gratifying that in the beginning of the spring of the happy reign, right counsel given by the wise, who have access to the Royal throne, found due appreciation. The devoted servant full of humility and solicitation desires heartily to accompany the Royal stirrups and thus be able to exert himself in the Royal Service. But in accordance with the Royal command which is of a piece with life and faith, the devoted servant would continue to serve in the interest of the Exalted Court as a means of his own salvation in the two worlds. In future also whatever the Exalted Commands might be, they would be carried out punctiliously and should be considered as a justification for his self-exaltation. May the benign shadow remain over the head of all the devoted servants for ever.”

This letter was probably written sometime in 1754 just after Shah Nawaz Khan succeeded Syed Lashkar Khan as Diwan and Wakil-e-Mutlaq of Salabat Jung. It was in the same year that Emperor Ahmed Shah was blinded and triumphant Imadul Mulk Ghaziuddin Khan, grand-son of Nizamul Mulk Asaf-Jah I and patron of Shah Nawaz Khan set up Alamgir II as the Mughal Emperor. Imadul Mulk Ghaziuddin Khan's rival, the redoubtable

1. Name of Shah Nawaz Khan Samsamud Daulah.

Safdar Jung, after wielding power for six years, was forced to retire to Oudh where he was destined to found a dynasty.

It was probably at the instance of Imadul Mulk Ghaziuddin Khan Firuz Jung that Shah Nawaz Khan got in touch with the Emperor who bestowed on him Mahi-Maratib (the Fish Insignia), an honour of which the privilege was specially conferred on princes and great nobles. For the conferment of the rare honour on Shah Nawaz Khan Samsamud Daulah the chronogram was found in the hemistichه ار شاه هند آمد ماهی و هم مراتب (1116 S Hijri).

Letter addressed to Monsieur Dupleix. —

“Praise be to Almighty !

I consider you to be unique in sympathy and benevolence. We are sure that you want improvement and tranquillity in our affairs just as we want in yours. During the time that the Mughal Emperor has lain low at the hands of the Marathas, the latter's pride has increased hundredfold. So far as our administration is concerned we do not find ourselves in a position to undertake conquest or realise tribute from others owing to lack of resources and excess of expenditure on salaried persons of which the details may be known later. Now it seems impossible to realise the tribute from Seringapatam on which our prosperity is dependent. Unless a tour is undertaken after the rainy season, the country can not remain in a state of tranquillity and the opposition crushed. As there prevails complete friendship and harmony between us it should be feasible to advance us a loan of ten or fifteen lakhs of rupees so that we could conciliate the soldiery and undertake expeditions. Otherwise, there is danger of the country shrinking and the resources getting attenuated beyond recovery. As you know, we on our part paid the contribution promised by Muzaffar Jung which was not a small sum. I should like to assure you that after completing the general organization of the administration there will not be any negligence or delay towards the payment of the loan. Your fame will spread far and wide for helping us with an army under Monsieur Bussy and also for offering us monetary help at such a critical moment. This will be taken as the tribute of the Carnatic by some people. But if the loan is advanced the soldiery will find a basis for hope, the enemy will be overawed and the government shall regain its lost confidence.

You might realise this in justice that we have foregone for your sake thirty-two lakhs of rupees annually which would be one crore and thirty lakhs in four years. It was in consideration of your interest that we even refused to receive fifteen lakhs from Muhammad Ali of Arcot and twenty lakhs from the English in the form of cash or draft cheques (tip). It is against reason and expediency to give away portion of the state which is like a mole on the fair face of the Deccan. In this connection let us know whatever you consider to be right and proper. As a true friend it would be in the fitness of things to give us full authority as a free agent to do what is expedient in the circumstances. Hope that you will give us the benefit of your valuable advice in detail which will be a means of comforting us a great deal".

In this letter several issues are raised. First is the bankruptcy of the state. When Shah Nawaz Khan succeeded Syed Lashkar Khan in the Diwanship in 1754, the state was practically bankrupt. The state-finances had reached such a low ebb that even the ruler had to go without money. According to Hadiqat-ul Alam "when Samsamud-Daulah assumed the reins of Wikalat-e-Mutlaq the government of Nawab Salabat Jung was in extreme financial straits. Salabat Jung's household objects were sold to meet the expenses of the palace. Samsamud Daulah by his wonderful management succeeded in easing the financial difficulties. It would be apt to say that by his masterly touch he made the dry river flow again.¹"

It was in these circumstances that Shah Nawaz Khan Samsamud Daulah asked for a loan from Dupleix. But the latter, although he believed that the French prestige should be maintained in the Deccan even if it were at the cost of diplomatic and military defeat in the Carnatic, could not be of much help to Samsamud Daulah. After the failure of the second siege of Trichinopoly by the French in 1753, Dupleix lacked in calm judgement. His prestige was waning, his power was about to be annihilated. His financial condition was none too good. His country had lost confidence in him. Probably Shah Nawaz Khan Samsamud Daulah's letter reached Pondichery some time when the orders of his recall and Godeheu's appointment to the Governorship of the French settlements in India were already issued by the French Government.

In this letter there is also a hint about Bussy's galling interference in administrative matters. We know on authority that after his return to Hyderabad in 1753, the whole attitude of Bussy had undergone a change. He had compelled Syed Lashkar Khan to sign an agreement ceding the Sarkais of Guntur, Rajahmundry, Ellore and Chicacole for the support of the French army. Although Bussy tacitly engaged himself to support Syed Lashkar Khan in the office of Diwan but very soon he created such a situation that

حالتی داشت کہ ارسے ری نویت نہ مروت اثار اللہ رسدہ ہوں۔ دیوان
مصام الدہلوی سے کسی تہد نہ ہوں کہ آپ رقم پر جو آمد (حدیثم العام) چاہیں
(۲۳۹)

Syed Lashkar Khan got so disconcerted that he sent in his resignation and retired into private life. Shah Nawaz Khan succeeded him.

Bussy's interference continued even during the Ministership of Shah Nawaz Ali Khan. It was due to this that the latter was compelled to organize the Anti-French party with the help of Mir Nizam Ali Khan. The party aimed at keeping Bussy at a distance from the management of State affairs. The repeated defeats of the French in the Carnatic shook Salabat Jung's confidence in the French. At Shah Nawaz Khan's instance he opened secret negotiations with the English which culminated in the treaty of Masulipatam entered into between Salabat Jung and the East India Company in May, 1759.

The Political Parties at Nizam Ali Khan's Darbar

BY

MIR MAHMOOD ALI, M. A. (Hyderabad-Dn)

NIZAMUL MULK, the founder of the Asafjahi dynasty was a distinguished general and a born statesman. He was appointed as subedar of the Deccan in 1713. His repeated efforts to save the Delhi Sultanate having failed he resolved to save his own province of the Deccan, of which he was the de-facto ruler from 1724 onwards. He restored the Mughal conquests in the Deccan, crushed the Marathas, and established peace and order in the country. His dominions extended all over the Deccan and he was really an independent sovereign.

On the death of Nizamul Mulk in 1748, the war of succession began between his second son Nasir Jung and his grandson Muzaffar Jung. This was the opportunity for the French and the English to interfere in the political affairs of the Deccan. Dupleix, the French Governor of Pondicherry supported the claims of Muzaffar Jung and the English offered their services to Nasir Jung. In this war Nasir Jung was assassinated and Muzaffar Jung met the same fate. Afterwards, with the help of the French, Salabat Jung, the third son of Nizamul Mulk became the ruler of the Deccan. But as Hollingbery puts it, "Salabat Jung, a prince deficient both in personal courage and sagacity"¹ was dethroned at Bidar in 1761 and Nizam Ali Khan, the fourth son of Nizamul Mulk became the king of the Deccan as Asafjah II.

Nizam Ali Khan ruled over the Deccan for a long time, extending over forty-two years. Salabat Jung towards the close of his reign had sustained a crushing defeat at the hands of the Marathas, and according to the treaty of Udgir in 1760, most of the provinces of the Deccan had gone into the hands of the Marathas.² When Nizam Ali Khan ascended the Masnad in 1761, there was neither former area of the state left nor there was any prestige of the ruler.³ Riots and rebellions were rampant in the country. Such was the internal condition of the state. As far as friendly foreign policy is concerned, it was a fact that there were no relations with the neighbouring countries of the Marathas, Mysore or the Carnatic. The French were very influential at the Deccan Court and they were intriguing against the Hyderabad State.

2 Tuzaki Asafia P. 112, and Sivarul Mutakhereen Vol III P. 902

3 The Nizam, his History and relations with the British Govt. by H G. Briggs. P. 63, to promote their selfish ends Hyderabad was not on friendly relations with the English. Nizam Ali Khan had thus to solve many thorny problems.

We find that there was a sort of balance of power in the later half of the 18th Century, between the Marathas, Mysore and the English. If two of these powers had united against the third, then the very existence of the third power was in danger. It is a fact that national politics is based on selfish motives. Therefore the Hyderabad State had to keep all these things in view, and maintain the balance of Power in the Deccan.

The Marathas from the very beginning were hostile towards Hyderabad State. Tippu Sultan of Mysore was becoming very powerful. If Tippu Sultan and the Marathas were to lead a combined invasion upon Hyderabad then Hyderabad would have been utterly powerless to face them. Therefore, Nizam Ali Khan agreed to entertain an alliance with the English.¹ Cornwallis, who was then the Governor general of Bengal, formed a triple alliance, against Tippu Sultan with the Marathas and the Nizam.² The aim of Asaf Jah II in joining the triple alliance was to be safe from the Marathas. Thus the third Mysore war was fought in which the allies were successful.

During Sir John Shore's Governor-generalship the Marathas, one of the members of the triple alliance, invaded Hyderabad State which was another member of the alliance. The English were bound by the Treaty to help Hyderabad, but owing to the prevailing policy of non-intervention, Sir John Shore refused to interfere on behalf of Hyderabad State against the formidable Marathas, with the result that Hyderabad had to suffer a defeat at Khardala.³ This naturally incensed Nizam Ali Khan, who dismissed the English officers in his armies for some time. He entertained the French and under M. Raymond new sepoys were recruited. The services rendered by M. Raymond were highly rewarded. Thus M. Raymond was most popular figure and was at the zenith of his power. This was during the last decade of the 18th Century when the Deccan came once more under the influence of the French.

In February, 1796, all of a sudden Nizam Ali Khan got ill and the question of his succession arose. There were at least four parties at the Darbar, whose aims were at variance with one another. The result was chaos. First and foremost there was the party of the heir-apparent Sikandar Jah. The prince had a strong liking for the French. He was a staunch supporter of Raymond, and considered him useful for himself. He used to swear by M. Raymond's head. In this way Sikandar Jah's party was highly in favour of the French, and wanted to have a firm friendship with the French. There was the Paigah party, which did not like the English and therefore they also favoured the French.

There were some people at the Darbar who wanted to have an alliance with Tipu Sultan¹. There was one more party which supported the Marathas. The most influential party was in favour of reviving friendship with the English. The leaders of this party were the most prominent persons like Azamul Umara Asaf Jah, and Mir Alam. It was an opportune time for this party as the French general M. Raymond had died the same year and the supporters of the French had lost faith in them. Fortunately for the English, Wellesly had become the Governor general of India and in the same year a treaty of mutual help and friendship was concluded. By this Treaty the French were dismissed from the Hyderabad State.

Then in the year 1800, the famous treaty of Subsidiary Alliance was concluded, which forms the basis on which today the relations between the Faithful Ally, the Nizam, and the British Crown are based.

Thus we find that the reign of Nizam Ali Khan was a revolutionary period, when the very foundations of the State were shaking. It was by the sagacity, far-sighted policy and statesmanship of Asaf Jah II that the state of Hyderabad was not only saved, but was firmly established. Thus Nizam Ali Khan Asaf Jah II was the true builder and saviour of the Hyderabad State.

Hand made paper industry in H. E. H. the Nizam's Dominions in the 18th and 19th Centuries

BY

SYED BADSHAH HUSSAIN, (HYDERABAD-DN)

HAND made paper industry is a very old industry of India. The handmade paper of Kashmir was as famous in the east as the muslin of Dacca was known throughout the Orient. But as we are concerned here with the development of this industry in the Deccan we have to trace the progress from the times of Sultan Allauddin Khilji who, it is told, brought the artisans from Delhi to Deogiri, the present Daulatabad in or about the last decade of the thirteenth century A D This was just the beginning But when Mohammed Bin Tughlaq attempted to shift his capital from Delhi to Daulatabad in 1338 A D the handmade paper makers of Delhi were brought to Daulatabad in greater number and they were made to establish this industry on a firm ground The Kaghazis, as the paper makers were called, first established their factories within the Daulatabad Fort, but later on they were provided with suitable lands outside the rampart of the Fort An interesting anecdote is connected with the shifting of the factories It is told that one of the favourite harams of the Sultan complained against the noise made by the paper makers during the process of paper making not only in the day time but at night also which caused a disturbance to the lady The Sultan, as a result, ordered that the Kaghazis should be shifted outside the Fort but care should be taken to provide all possible facilities to them Afterwards the industry was maintained by the Kaghazis themselves until the reign of Aurangzeb who gave fresh impetus to the industry by granting concessions to the Kaghazis Here I may be allowed to refer to a legend which says that a cradle made out of handmade paper was presented to the Emperor who was very much pleased to see that it supported the weight of a child

Nizam-ul-mulk Asaf Jah I followed in the footsteps of the three Great Emperors But Nawab Mir Nizam Ali Asaf Jah II took great interest and exerted his personal influence to better the conditions of the Kaghazis and the paper industry As we are especially interested in this period we would very much like to refer to some of the important sanads and Firman issued by Mu Nizam Alikhan There are some valuable documents preserved to this day in the records of the Daftar-e-Divani, Mal and Mulki which throw light on this aspect The first document which I would like to refer here is a Sanad issued under the seal of Sam Sam-ul-Mulk, the then Premier, on the 22nd Shaaban 16th regnal year, i e 1189 H The Sanad was granted to exempt the paper manufacturers and dealers of Kaghazi pura, Daulatabad, from some of the taxes The Gumashtas of Jagiris and Karoris etc were made known of the fact that the Kaghazis were allowed to take waters from the adjacent reservoir and to construct pools for the purpose of paper making without paying the water tax and that they were allowed to import raw materials free of customs duty

Another document which may be mentioned here is a draft of the Parwana addressed to the Zamindars of the Paigana Haveli-e-Daulatabad wherein Nawab Mir Nizam Ali Khan had granted concessions in pursuance of the old Sanads and Firmans. He was so much personally interested in this industry that in an order issued on the 17th Muharram 1195 H, he very graciously accorded permission to the Kaghazis of the Kaghaziwara for making special variety of paper to be named after the Nizam himself

The most interesting document which I could find on this subject is a memorandum on the estimate of Rs 2,696/8/-for 506 gaddis¹ of different varieties and qualities of paper prepared under the supervision of Sikander Yar Jung and Md Abdul Lateef Khan and purchased for the Government use in the reign of Nawab Sikander Jah (1803-1829 A D.) The date of this paper is 15th Zikada 1225 H The memorandum records 7 varieties of paper together with their existing prices, the details of which are given below.

Afshan or —	Muhia dai or —	Bhongui numa

Before closing this very brief survey of the industry I must make a mention of the fact that Kaghziwara or Kaghazipura of Daulatabad was not the only village where handmade paper was manufactured. There were more or less six places in the Dominions viz Elloia, Gurud, Koratla, Warangal, Medak and the City of Hyderabad where this industry flourished. But it should be made known here that more or less the Kaghazis of Daulatabad were pioneers and as a matter of fact promoters of this industry. Even to this day handmade paper is made in these different places. The Government of Hyderabad is still alive to the need for extending patronage to the Kaghazis. Rag, hemp and waste-paper are being supplied to this day to the Kaghazis. Bambu pulp is also being supplied and the results have been found very encouraging. Necessary chemicals have been purchased by the Government and are being distributed to the paper makers according to their requirements. These efforts of the Government have resulted in making up the acute shortage of mill-made paper during the war time.

Some Aspects of the History of the N. Circars During the Period 1724-1774

AT the fall of the great Empire of Aurangzeb, Godavari District formed a portion of the province of Golconda which was one of the 22 Provinces composing the SUBHA of the Deccan. It was taken by Qamuruddin Asafjah I, who was the greatest of the Nizams who fixed his capital at Hyderabad and showed nominal allegiance to Delhi. Golconda comprised the Nawabships of Aicot, Kurnool, Rajahmundry and Chicacole. The Nizam made Anwaruddin (father of Muhammad Ali of the Carnatic), the Nawab of the two latter districts. His administration was strong and severe. He was helped by an energetic subordinate Rustumkhan who ruled at Rajahmundry as Nawab. His iron rule is thus described by James Grant (See page 223 Godavari Dt. Gaz.) —“At length the memorable battle of Shuckerkud in 1724 gave a transient repose to the Deccan and transferred in fact, though not in form, the sovereignty of this great limb of Moghul Empire to Asafjah. Great were the benefits derived from the vigour and integrity of Rustumkhan who, from 1732 for seven years, ruled with the most ample delegated sway at Rajahmundry with the other four Southern Provinces. There, the zamindars availed themselves of the surrounding distractions on the death of Aurangzeb (1707) to usurp the rights and feeble authority of their Mohammadan Superintendents. To correct these dangerous abuses and restore the necessary forms of internal administration were the arduous tasks assigned to the new Jiladar, the conduct of the man so fully justifies the Nizam's choice that even to this day it is held in general as an example worthy of imitation for necessary policy, considerable humanity, and rigid and universal justice. At the same time, as the zamindars defrauded the public treasury and as they squeezed, with the iron hand of oppression, the industrious husbandmen and manufacturers the first object of Rustumkhan's government was a total extirpation of such merciless tyrants. Those who escaped the sword were proclaimed as traitors and a reward offered for their own, with their adherents' heads. A sufficient number was soon collected to erect two of those shocking pyramidal monuments called 'kullaminai' near each of the provincial capitals' for one of which kind, the cruelty of Nadar Shah is held in Europe so justly in abhorrence. The inhabitants in general feared and admired him and the severe administration of Rustumkhan which he now further distinguished by substituting Amins or temporary collectors in the room of the refractory zamindars was proverbial for exemplary excellence in the Northern Circars." We learn the following facts from local Kaifiyets, Ballads and Estate Records —

Asafjah ruled from 1724 to 1748 under the title of Nizam ul-mulk as the independent viceroy at Hyderabad. He divided the Deccan Subadary into 22 Paraganas of which Rajamundiy was one. As already stated he appointed Anwaruddin as Nawab of Rajahmundry and Chicacole Circars, and this Anwaruddin appointed a Turkish Officer working under him named Haji Hussain alias Rustumkhan as Nawab of Rajamundiy District and empowered him to collect the arrears of revenues from the zamindars of the Circars. Rustumkhan therefore resolved to enter on his duties which were unpleasant. From the local ballad, the song of Rayaparaju, it appears that Rustum and his son Nuruddin were both formerly employed in Peddapur Estate under the Jagapathis, as the rulers of the Samasthanam (Estate) were called, in the 17th Century. Owing to reasons of policy and ambition, Rustumkhan left Peddapur, approached Nawab Anwaruddin for service and by pleasing him got himself raised to the Nawabship of Rajahmundry which office he held from 1732 to 1739 A. D. He was a very firm, just, and hard task-master. The then condition of the Circars was chaotic. Civil strife among the zamindars and their oppression of the weak peasants and absence of all law and order were rampant. The following are the chief causes — (1) fall of Jagapathis of Kalinga (2) Fall of Vijayanagar as a result of its defeat at Talikot in 1565 (3) Invasion of N. Circars by Golconda Nawabs (4) Scramble for power among the local Rajahs. Under these circumstances, Rustum had to discharge his duties and overcome very powerful enemies, but this was naturally disliked by the zamindar of Mogaluturu called Kalidindi Ramaraju and the Zamindar of Nuzvid called Rao Subbanna who joined their forces and fought twice with the Khan with a view to prevent him from establishing himself at Rajahmundry. This was in 1734. The Mogaluturu Kaifiyat, a local record collected by Mackenzie states that when the Mogaluturu zamindar failed to oppose Rustumkhan successfully, he fled bag and baggage from the Estate. Along with the rulers of Nuzvid he reached Peddapur which was then ruled by a lady, Ragamma (wife of Vatsavayi Jagapathiraju) who was the regent of her son Timmaraju (1714 to 1734, vide Peddapur Samsthana charitra) and again attacked the Khan at Rajahmundry, but in vain. This time they reached Pithapur, then under the rule of Rao Venkata Krishnarao. But the Khan getting scent of this pursued them to Pithapur in 1735 and hence they, along with the ruler of Pithapur, fled into Thotapally Agency to raise a rebellion with the help of Konda Reddies (Hillmen). The Samalkota Karfiyat informs us that all, except Butchanna, a relative of the Pithapur ruler, died in the Agency while Butchanna was arrested and killed by the Khan. After gaining this victory, Rustum reached Peddapur with a view to take revenge on its rulers who gave help to his enemies, the rulers of Mogaluturu and Nuzvid. But knowing the strength of the fort and the difficulties of siege warfare, he had recourse to a wily stratagem. The Kimmur Karfiyat tells us that the Khan sent his own son Nuruddin Hussain who was a playmate and friend of the two minor Rajahs of Peddapur, with a letter to Rangamma, the queen mother in which he praised her just rule and the glories of the ancient and great estate and begged her to send her two sons for an interview with him so that the enjoyment of the estate may be permanently confirmed on them. The queen who confided in the innocent words of Nuruddin and who did not suspect any treachery sent her two sons, Timmaraju and Balabhadraiaju with only two or three attendants along with Nuruddin, who really did not know the real mind of his own father. The interview was as brief and effective as it was tragical and treacherous, because the two young princes were soon burnt to death with boiling oil. The news reached the queen's ears. Thinking that all was over and afraid of the consequence of the fall of the fort, the whole harem made a Jauhar. But the queen before her death managed to send away the infant son of her elder son, called Jagapathy, aged only 7 months from out of the fort through a trusted female Brahmin servant. The child was destined to reach his relative, the ruler of Vijayanagaram, Pusapati Vijayaramaraj but on the very day the infant was detected and imprisoned at Pithapur. Rustumkhan after reducing the Peddapur fort and leaving a garrison there marched against Pithapur but there he was killed treacherously by his own son Nuruddin Hussain Khan who did not like the cruel ways of his father. He also reported the event to Anwaruddin who praised him for the deed and conferred the Nawabship of Rajamundry on him and even encouraged him to subdue the Chicacole Circar. While Nuruddin reached Chebrole on his way to Kalinga, the army of Vijayaramaraju of Vijayanagaram (the Rajah heard of the fall of Peddapur fort and the imprisonment of the royal infant at Pithapur) was upon him. The Pusapati Karfiyat tells us that in the battle of Chebrole, Nuruddinkhan was killed and as a result, the royal infant was saved and taken to Vijayanagar. But the Peddapur Estate which fell into Mohammedan hands for the first time in 1734 soon began to decline.

Rustumkhan must be praised for his military exploits, clever tactics and just and wise policy. He put down greedy Zamindars and helped the poor cultivators. He replaced the former by Amins so that he might regularly get the taxes due. He gave grants of lands to poets, village officers, and other servants and the Persian Firman of Hejua 1146 proves the same. The donee of this Firman Atchanna Kulkarni was rewarded probably for his loyal and faithful services. Atchanna as well as Antanna referred to in the grant, seem to be related to Lakshmana or Yenugu Lakshmana Kavi who was a court-poet of the Peddapur rulers about this period. Rustum announced large rewards for the capture of rebels and conferred titles on such of the proprietors who readily paid their taxes and helped him with men and supplies. During his seven years of non and bloody regime, the only black act was the treacherous killing of the Peddapur princes. But this statement which is found in all the Kasfiyats or local records as well as the ballads is refuted by the following statement found in the Godavari District Gazetteer — "The line of descent (Peddapur) was unbroken till 1734 when the estate was ruled by Rangamma who was defeated near Peddapur by Rustumkhan for helping the chiefs of Ellore, Mogaluturu and Pithapur" ¹

The N. Circars formed a part of the great Vijayanagar Empire till the battle of Talikota in 1565. Owing to the victory gained by the Muhamadans then N. Circars passed, as stated above, into the hands of the Qutub Shahi dynasty of Golconda and remained under their sway for more than a century. At the end of the reign of Abul Hussein Qutub Shah (1672-1688) Golkonda, was taken by Aurangzeb in 1687 and made a part of the Moghal Empire. Henceforward Rajamundry, and Chicacole Circars also passed under Moghal control. To rule over these newly conquered countries, Aurangzeb appointed a Viceroy or Subehdar for the Deccan. After Aurangzeb's death in 1707, the Moghal Empire began to decline and Qumruddin Asaf Jah who remained a Viceroy under the Moghals till 1723, became independent and ruled over the Deccan till 1748 A.D. with the title of Nizam-ul-Mulk. The Subah of Golconda which comprised Arcot, Kurnool, Rajamundry and Chicacole Circars came under his control and he appointed Nawabs to rule over the several divisions. Anwaruddin was thus appointed as the Nawab of Rajamundry and Chicacole Circars. He, in his turn, appointed Rustumkhan as a general under him to collect the arrears of tribute from the several Zamindars of Rajamundry and Chicacole divisions. I have already described the 1 For preparing the account, I have consulted the Kasfiyats of Samalkot, Kimoor, Korukonda, Pusapati (Vizianagar m), Mogaluturu Kondavidu and Peddepura Chawira and Review thereon, as well as some Persian Firmans and Original letters of the F. I. Co., in English. The Kaddiegula family history and letters have also helped me in the matter.

seven year's rule (1732-1739) of Rustumkhan over Godavari District. He was murdered for his cruel deeds, by his own son, Nuruddin Hussain who was appointed to collect arrears from both the Rajamundry and Chicacole (Kalingam) division. As he was proceeding to the north, Pusapati Peda Vijaya Rama Razu of Vizianagaram who heard of the base murder of Timma Razu of Peddapur and of the imprisonment of his minor son Jagapathy Razu met him with a large force and defeated and killed him near Chebrole in the Godavari District,

He then brought up Jagapathy Razu along with his brother's son Ananda Razu at Vizianagaram till in 1749, he reinstated him as Raja of Peddapur with the permission of the Amindar, Nizam Ali. But, on hearing this news, Jaffer Ally, the Nawab of Mustafanagar (Kondapalli), Ellore, Rajmundry and Chicacole Circars got angry and attacked the fort of Peddapur, but in vain. It was at this time that, owing to the death of Asaf Jah, the first Nizam, in 1748 civil war broke out at Hyderabad between the Nizam's second son, Nasir Jang and his nephew Mirjapha Jang. (Muzaffar) The two parties applied for help to the English and the French respectively. The war which ensued is known as the second Carnatic war (1748-1754). The defeat and death of Nasir Jang and the accession to the throne of Mirjapha Jang who did not live long after this are well known events. The French General, Bussy proclaimed the third son of Asaf Jah, Salabat Jang by name, as the Subedar of the Deccan. The latter therefore granted the N. Circars to the French so that with the revenues raised out of them they might maintain their troops (1752-1753). With a view to obtain possession of the newly ceded Circars, General Bussy deputed Mons. Moracain with a body of troops. But Jaffer Ally Khan who was now governor of Rajahmundry and Chicacole Circars refused to allow the French to take possession of them and persuaded the Zamindar of Vizianagaram and Bobbili Viz., Peda Vijayarama Gajapathi and Rangarao Bahadur respectively, to help him in his task. But Monsicur. Moracain secretly made a treaty with the Zamindar of Vizianagaram by which he agreed to rent the two Circars of Rajahmundry and Chicacole to him at a lower rate than before. On knowing this, Ranga Rao of Bobbili (Chicacole Circar) resolved to drive out the French at any cost. Meanwhile, Bussy, on hearing of a Mahiatta invasion, reached Rajahmundry in the middle of 1754 but soon after left for Aurangabad. However he soon returned at the end of 1756 to Rajahmundry with a view to put down the rebellious Zamindars and in particular, Bobbili.

From Rajamundry, he moved on against the Fort of Bobbili along with the forces of Peddapur and Vizianagar. In January 1757, the famous battle of Bobbili was fought in which both Rangarao and Vijaya Ramaraju were killed. The ballad of Bobbili gives the causes and results of this battle. On hearing this news, Vijayaramaraju's elder brother's son, by name Ananda Raju resolved to break off the treaty made with the French and to drive them out of N. Circars by inviting the English. This was due to the rebuke given by Mons. Bussy to him. He wrote to the English General, Robert Clive at Calcutta who sent Colonel Forde to help him. Both of them then entered into a treaty by which (1) All the countries which would be conquered in future should be handed over to the Raja of Vijayanagar for collecting rents. (2) All seaports and towns situated in the River mouths should be handed over to the English. (3) The Raja of Vizianagar should give to the English monthly a sum of a Rs $\frac{1}{2}$ a lakh for maintaining the army and Rs 6,000 towards expenses of officers. (4) The lands under the control of either party should not be sold or given away without the consent of both. (5) They should unite their armies and defeat the French and drive them out of N. Circars.

Having made this treaty both the parties moved on towards Rajahmundry but meeting the French troops under De Conflans, (the then successor of De Bussy who was transferred to Karnatic), half-way at Gollaprolu, they fought a battle at Chendurthi or Kundur and defeated them in December 1758. Col. Forde pursued them to Rajahmundry and taking that fort, still further pursued them. At this time Ananda Gajapati of Vizianagar attacked the forts of Peddapur and Pittapur, then under the control of Jagapathi raju and Peda Mahipati and Neeladri Rayaningars respectively and subdued them. He then marched to Rajahmundry and demanded that fort from the English but in vain. Then, he refused to fulfil the treaty obligations. Hence Col Ford had to return to Rajahmundry only to find Ananda Gajapati fleeing to the hills. It was at this juncture that John Andrew, captain of the troops of the E. I. Co. at Vizag was sent to negotiate with Ananda Gajapati and he succeeded in effecting a compromise by which E. I. Co. received a large amount (Vide letter No. 1 printed). Then, both Col. Forde and Ananda Gajapati moved on to Ellore. From thence Col. Forde went and took Masulipatam from the French and made a treaty with Salabat Jung by which the latter handed over Masulipatam and its neighbouring lands to the English and undertook to drive out the French from the country. In return, the English recognised his power over the N. Circars. Meanwhile, Ananda Gajapati returned to Samalkot and fought a battle at Undur against Jagapati Raju of Peddapur and killed him. He took the forts of Pittapur, Samalkot and Peddapur but did not live long to enjoy the fruits of his labours. He died of small-pox at Rajahmundry in April 1759, and a tomb and garden of his can still be seen close to the N. bank of the R. Godavari near the railway station. Then Vijayaramaraju's wife Chandrayamma adopted a boy and named him Vijayaramaraju. At the same time Jagapati Raju's minor son, Timma IV was placed on the Peddapur throne (1760—1797). On the death of Salabat Jung Hyderabad passed into the hands of Mir Nizam Ali Khan, (1761—1803). With a view to make good his claims on the Rajahmundry and Chicacole Circars, the Nizam moved with a large army to Kovvur on the southern bank of the Godavari. There, he was met by the minor Rajahs of Peddapur, Pittapur and Vijayanagar who paid homage and agreed to pay the arrear tributes. In return, they were confirmed in their respective Zamindaries. It was during the reign of this Nizam Ali Khan that the E. I. Co. made efforts to take for rent the Five Circars. Already, their settlements were established at many places. Originally, a Fumun of Sultan Abdulla Qutub Shah of Golconda helped the E. I. Co., to settle at Masulipatam in 1611 and build their first factory on the east coast. A grant of land near Mylapore made by the Vijayanagar Emperor in 1639 enabled them to build Fort St. George in 1653. From this time onwards, more settlements were established along the east coast With the establishment of the United East India Company in 1703, English trade and settlements received great impetus More factories were set up all along the East Coast.

After the town of Masulipatam was captured by the English in the year A. D. 1759, during the time of the Honourable George Pigot, Governor of Fort St. George, and the Company's Officers entered into Northern Circars, two Golconda Vyapi Brahmin Dubhashis by name, Jogee Pantulu and Venkatarayalu were employed as inspectors to the chief-in-Council, stationed at Masulipatam. At that time they used their best endeavours to put the Chiefs in possession of the country

In the year 1764, the Madras Government endeavoured to take for rent the 5 Circars, 1 Kondavid or Mutunjannagar, 2, Ellore, 3. Mustufanagar (Kondapalli) 4 Rajahmundry 5 Chikacole On that occasion, for negotiating matters with Nizam Ali Khan Kandregula Jogee Pantulu was chosen and was sent to Hyderabad in the same year, as an ambassador on behalf of the E I Company, with requisite honours of rank suited for the purpose (Vide letters Nos. 2, 3, and 4 published in J A H R S vol 3.) He was successful, and the Company obtained the Circars for rent.

At that time, on Jogee Pantulu's laying before the Nizam his claims to succeed to the offices of Mazumdar and Sui Sheristadar of Rajahmundry Circar, formerly enjoyed by his maternal grandfathers (Jillella family) the Nizam was pleased to restore him, as well as his two brothers (Ramjee and Venkatryulu) to the said offices by means of a fresh Sanad, and conferred on Jogee Pantulu the Titles of "Rajah Bahadur".

The above grant was confirmed by the Honourable Company by means of a Sunnad of the President and Council of Fort St. George.

By virtue of the Sunnud of the Nizam and the orders of the Government of Fort St. George, the several Zamindars in the Northern Circars restored to Jogee Pantulu all the 100sooms, savarans, 100 Villages, coconut and beetlenut gardens,

Inams, &c, appertaining to the above offices in their respective estates and yielding an annual income of about 30,000 Pagodas. In addition to the above, Jogi Pantulu used to rent some villages, and also in some years the Divi Punganah from the Government, who reposed in him especial trust and confidence in consideration of the allegiance and steady attachment, which he manifested to the Honourable East India Company

About the year 1772, Jogi Pantulu died His younger brother Venkatarayulu succeeded him in the office of Muzumdar and Sur Sheristadar in the year 1773, and continued in it till 1778, when the office in question was abolished as useless to Government, and the lands and fees, villages &c, pertaining thereto were returned to the respective Zamindars In compensation for the loss thereby sustained an allowance of 10,000 Pagodas a year was ordered to be paid to Venkatarayulu from the Company's treasury

The fiscal condition of the Rajahmundry Circar — and this applies to other Circars as well — was most unsatisfactory during the whole period. From 1760 to 1797, Timma Jagapati was the Maharajah of Peddapur Vijayarajamaraju II was the then ruler of Vizayanagar. Both these were paying Jumma or Tribute (fee which a feudatory should pay to the Suzerain) to the Nizam, but both were showing signs of revolt frequently. Peddapur Rajah paid 1,14,283 Pagodas or Karaku Varahas (a gold coin worth Rs. 4)

After 1766 when the Company obtained rights over Circars, the tribute or Paiskash was raised to 1,27987 and by the end of the century it was raised to 1,60,000 Varahas Though the tribute was thus raised, the Zamindars were enabled to cut down their troops as the Company gave the help of their Sihibandi or troops in putting down the revolts of the minor chiefs and in recovering the arrears due from them Maharatta incursions were also put down and the country enjoyed the benefits of peaceful trade and order.

The Company's officials, being ignorant of the native dialects, entrusted the management of their affairs to their advisers, called Dubashis or Interpreters, and one such Dubashi or Dvibhashi was Jogi Pantulu who was entertained by the Company in 1759 and who, by his long and faithful services in obtaining the Circars for rent from the Nizam to the Company, rose rapidly to a powerful position. From 1756—69, he was joint-renter of Rajahmundry Circar and thus controlled the Zamindars. Hence his position was envied by the Zamindars and especially by the Raja of Peddapur. Till the advent of Lord Cornwallis reforms in 1793, such as, the Permanent Revenue Settlement, the separation and establishment of the offices of District Collector and District Judge and the organization of the Police, the Rajahmundry Circar may be said, along with other Circars, to have suffered much from want of law and Order.

The revenue administration of the Circars was previously done on a commercial basis. The profits on weaving and spinning and cloth printing, sea-customs, revenue from salt, abkari and agricultural farms amounted to several lakhs. Col Forde, who made a treaty with the Nizam after conquering the Circars by driving out the French in 1759, leased out the revenues for three years and, from 1762, the annual lease system was adopted but as the arrears began to increase, it was given up in 1765 in favour of the five years lease system. The renters were expected to pay up fully and to look to the welfare of the inhabitants (cultivators) of the farms. During this period, there was dual control over Northern Circars because the Nizam appointed the Nawabs to collect the revenues, while the Company also supervised by giving military help to the Nawabs. Hussain Ally Khan was appointed to govern the Circars but as he was weak, the Zamindars to whom they were leased out resisted and paid little. There was anarchy in the country. Now Hussain Ally made an alliance with the

1 The Company rented out the Rajahmundry Circar at an annual rent of 3,83,500 Madras Pagodas to Hussain Ally and Jogi Pantulu jointly, and Ellore and Mustafanagar to Hussain Ally only at over 4 lakhs of Madras Pagodas per year. The Zamindars were asked to recognise the authority of these renters. Peddapur and Samalkot revolted but the Company's troops put them down. The several forts in the Circars were gradually destroyed and the number of native troops greatly reduced. The Zamindars' right to levy transit duties was also abolished. The Company desired to control the Government and in 1769, the rentership of both Hussain Ally and Jogi Pantulu was ended by the Company and the Circars were leased out separately to the highest bidder.

Jogi Pantulu and after his death his brother Venkatarayulu enjoyed the offices of Mazumdar and Shensadai till their abolition finally in 1781. They also rented out several farms and enjoyed Kusooms and other gifts till their abolition in 1786. The Reforms of Lord Cornwallis in 1793 placed the Circars, along with other possessions of the Honourable Company, on the road to peace and prosperity by ensuring law and order and by placing the revenue administration on an equitable and sure basis.

Madras Government with regard to revenue collection. When his authority ceased in 1762, owing to his dismissal by Nizam Ally Khan, the control of the English also ceased and the country witnessed worst anarchy. From 1764 to 1766, Hussain Ally Khan again held the office of the Naib (Governor) over the Circars and the Company's troops were again employed for revenue collection and the chief of Masulipatam was granted rights to collect revenues over certain Parganas in the Circars. At the end of 1765, the Company received Sanads from Emperor Shah Alam, as a result of the victory at Buxar in 1764, giving it the right to enjoy the revenues of the Circars. In 1766, the Company obtained the right of renting the Circars from Nizam Ally Khan through the clever negotiation of Kandregula Jogu Pantulu.

(چار شنبہ) کی صراحت ہے، لیکن دستور کے مطابق ہمارا قیاس ہے کہ
ناصر جنگ کی شہادت سے تین دن گزرنے کے بعد چوتھے دن ۱۱۶۳ھ
کو اتوار کے دن میدان جنگ ہی میں رسماً اس کی تکمیل ہوئی ہوگی کیونکہ باضابطہ
جشن تخت نشینی تو دارالسلطنت پٹنچے پر موقوف رہتا ہے تذکر الیلاو و الانحکام

تھا، لیکن تاریخ کی وضاحت اس میں بھی نہیں۔

ناصر جنگ کے قتل کے ساتھ ہی کارپردازان مظفر جنگ کو فی الفور
ایک خطرہ محسوس ہوا، کیونکہ اس وقت نواب شہید کے ہمراہ ان سے چھوٹے
ن کے اور تین بھائی اسی میدان میں موجود تھے۔ آصف جاہ کے فرزند
ہونے کی حیثیت سے، اور بھائی کے کوئی اولاد نہ ہونے کی وجہ سے بھائی کے
بھی وارث ہونے کے باعث، آصفی تخت پر ممکن ہونے کے مستحق
تھے۔ نواب مرحوم کا بھانجا، یا آصف جاہ کا نواسہ ہونے کے باوجود
واہان جاہ کی موجودگی میں قطعاً مظفر جنگ کو اس کا کوئی حق نہیں
پہنچتا تھا۔ بعض مؤرخ عجیب عجیب طریقے سے ناصر جنگ کی جانشینی
کے استحقاق کے خلاف کم زور دلائل پیش کرتے ہیں جس پر ہم ہنستے یا
حیران ہو جاتے ہیں۔ ناصر جنگ کی تخت نشینی کو تو جائز ثابت کرنے
کا یہ مقام نہیں۔ ناصر جنگ کا حق غصب کر لینے پر اگر اعتراض یا دعویٰ
یا حملہ کرنے کا حق تھا تو ان کے بڑے بھائی غازی الدین خان فیروز جنگ (ثانی)

کو تھا۔ لیکن فیروز جنگ نے جب تک ناصر جنگ زندہ رہے ان میں سے کسی بات پر عمل نہیں کیا۔ ہم یہاں مظفر جنگ کی تخت نشینی کو، اُس وقت موجود آصف جاکا کی اولاد کے مقابلہ میں حق بجانب ثابت کرنے سے عاجز ہیں۔ کہا جاتا ہے کہ محمد انور خاں نے بغرض حفاظت، ناصر جنگ کے تینوں بھائیوں اور ان کی بیگیوں کو، راجہ رام چندر کی جمعیت میں پہنچا دیا تھا۔ جو ”نواب مرحوم“ کے لشکر میں مقلد متالچیش پر مامور تھا۔ مظفر جنگ اسی خطرہ کو محسوس کر کے، جس کا ہم نے اوپر تذکرہ کیا ہے، دو تین فرانسیسی سرداروں کو (جس میں جیسے اور لاٹوش بھی شامل ہیں) حکم دیا کہ وہ فوراً ان لوگوں پر اپنی ”فوجی نگرانی“ قائم کر دیں۔ نواب نظام الملک کے جو بیٹے اس ”جنگ گاہ“ میں موجود تھے، ان کے نام اور ان کی عمریں حسب ذیل ہیں:—

(۱) سید محمد خاں صلابت جنگ۔ اُس وقت عمر تقریباً (۳۴) سال

(۲) میر نظام علی خاں اسدا جنگ۔ ” ” ” ” (۱۸)

(۳) میر محمد شریف خاں بسالت جنگ۔ ” ” ” ” (۱۵)

حسین علی کرمانی کہتا ہے کہ مظفر جنگ نے جب اُن لوگوں کی تلاش کرائی تو بڑی مشکل سے پتہ چلا، جس کے بعد انھوں نے اپنے ایک رازدار و معتد شخص کو بھیج کر اپنے پاس طلب کیا۔ آنے کے بعد بڑی تسلی دی اور مکارانہ صلح جوئی سے کام لیا۔ انور نامہ میں ہے کہ ان تینوں کو ہفت ہزاری منصب بھی عطا کیا۔

لہ تلہ علی الترتیب ان کے سب کے ولادت ۱۲۳۶ھ و ۱۲۳۷ھ اور ۱۲۳۸ھ میں دیکھے شجرہ مصفیہ ہوالدین خاں میر جتھے بیٹے ماموغل علی خاں ناصر الملک ہمایوں جاکا جن کی عمر ۱۲ سال تھی شاید اس وقت ساتھ نہ تھے۔
 عہد تذکرۃ السلاطین والحکام (علمی) - دہلی دیوانی سرکار مالی ۱۲۵۰ھ - انور نامہ (علمی) ۱۲۵۱ھ

تاریخِ نظفرہ میں بھی اسی قبیل کا بیان ہے جس سے معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ انہوں نے، صلابتِ جنگ، نظامِ علی خاں اور دیگر امراء کو بلا بلا کرتے دی۔ اور ھیراءُ الصفا سے واضح ہوتا ہے کہ :-

نواب صلابت جنگ و اسد جنگ و بسالت جنگ، نیز بدستور عہد سرداری ہمیشہ زادہ کہ درس بجائے بار کلاں بود۔

راستی گشتند ۔

ہمیں اس امر کی تصدیق کرنی پڑے گی کہ کیا فی الحقیقت نواب مظفر جنگ سبھوں سے عمر میں پڑے تھے، لیکن افسوس ہے کہ، دکن کی کسی تاریخ میں جو ہماری نظر سے اس وقت تک گزر سکی ہیں، ان کی تاریخ ولادت ہی نہیں ملتی اور اشارہ و کنایہ بھی ان کی عمر کا ذکر نہیں ملتا جس پر ہم کو بے انتہا تعجب ہے۔ شاید ہم آئندہ اپنی تحقیقات میں اس کا پتہ چلا سکیں۔ فی الحال تاریخِ فتحیہ کے ایک بیان کی مدد سے اس کو حل کرنے کی کوشش کریں گے۔

یوسف محمد خاں (فتحیہ) مظفر جنگ کے حالات کے ذیل میں لکھتا ہے،

کہ جس وقت ناصر جنگ، حضرت آصف جاہ سے باغی ہو کر مقابلہ پرا ترائے تھے، تو اس سحر کے میں مظفر جنگ اپنے والد متوسل خاں کے ساتھ شریک جنگ تھے اور اس وقت ان کی عمر (۱۷) سال تھی، یہ لڑائی ۲۰ جمادی الاولیٰ ۱۲۵۵ھ کو ہوئی تھی۔ اس لحاظ سے ان کا سن ولادت ۱۲۳۸ھ قرار پاسکتا ہے، اور تخت نشینی کا زیر بحث واقعہ (۱۲۶۲ھ) کا ہے۔ پس ان کی عمر اس وقت (۲۶) سال ثابت ہوتی ہے اور ان کے تینوں ماموں میں سب سے زیادہ عمر (۳۲) سال صلابت جنگ کی ہے۔

فتحیہ کا مؤلف۔ مظفر جنگ کا طرفدار اور ان کا مصاحب رہ چکا ہے۔

الغرض اس وقت باغیوں اور فرانسیزیوں کی فوجی طاقت، مظفر جنگ کی پشت پر موجود تھی۔ اس لیے ان کی تخت نشینی کو ح

بہرہ ہمتیہ زندہ خطبہ بہ نامش خوانند

کا نتیجہ سمجھنا چاہیے۔ خاندان آصفی کے اراکین، امرار اور دوسرے سردار سب مجبوراً اور بُری طرح گھرے ہوئے تھے۔ حریف نے سارے میدان کو قابو میں کر رکھا تھا۔ کسی کو مخالفت میں ”یارائے دم زدوں“ نہ تھا۔ بعض بڑے بڑے امراد و افرادِ خاندان یہاں موجود نہ تھے۔ بلکہ وہ دارالسلطنت اورنگ آباد میں تھے۔ اسی لیے چاروناچار سب کو اطاعت کرنی پڑی۔
مقام تخت نشینی | جیسا کہ ہم نے سطور گذشتہ میں لکھا ہے کہ اسی میدان میں جس میں آصفی سپاہ پڑاؤ ڈالے پڑی تھی۔ اور ناصر جنگ شہید ہوئے ہیں مظفر جنگ سربراہ آرائے حکومت ہوئے۔

لہذا جو مقام قتل ناصر جنگ ہے ا وہی تذکرے اور تاریخیں اس باب میں جو کچھ بیان نقل کریں گے۔

(۱) میں غلام علی آزاد (بگڑائی) جو ساتھ معرکہ میں موجود اور ناصر جنگ کے پاس بوقت شہادت حاضر تھے۔ سرو آزاد میں تحریر فرماتے ہیں کہ یہ مقام پانڈی چری سے تقریباً ۲۰- کو س (بہ میل) قریب قلعہ منجھی واقع تھا۔

(۲) ایک اور شریک کارزار افضل قاشال بیان کرتا ہے کہ ناصر جنگ کے فوجی خیمے، قلعہ جنبی سے ۶ کوس (۱۲ میل) کے فاصلہ پر نصب ہیں۔

(۳) تیسرا فوجی عہدہ دار فورس محمد خاں اپنی کتاب ”واقعات جانشینی آصف جاہ“ میں لکھتا ہے کہ ناصر جنگ پنج کردہ (۱۰ میل) قلعہ جنبی رسیدہ، سواد آن زمین را بقیام گاہ جلوہ گرفتار نمودند۔“

(۴) تایخ راحت افزا سے ظاہر ہوتا ہے کہ ناصر جنگ کا لشکر دو دریاؤں کے بیچ میں گھیر گیا تھا، جن میں سے ایک کا نام چکراؤتی ہے۔ (۵) تذکرۃ البلاد والحکام میں ایک جگہ پر ہے:-
”در میدان شرقی جنبی“ کہ اندرون قلعہ ٹھانہ فرانسس بود

افاعنہ بے باک از روئے دفا سر نواب مظلوم بریدہ۔“

(۶) اور دوسری جگہ اسی تذکرے نے، مقام کی بھی صاف وضاحت کرتے ہوئے، اس کا نام بھی لکھ دیا ہے۔ اس لحاظ سے ہماری اپنی تاریخوں میں یہی ایک کتاب ہے، جس نے نام کو بھی بالتصریح لکھا ہے، چنانچہ اس کے اصل الفاظ یہ ہیں:-

”چوں سواد موضع آلے گرام متعلقہ جنبی کہ سر کروہے شرقیت“

محل نزول رایات آصف جاہی گردید۔“

مولوی حکیم سید شمس اللہ صاحب قادری نے اپنے رسالہ تاریخ میں اس مقام کو تاریخ راحت افزا کی روشنی میں تلاش کرنے کی کوشش کی ہے لیکن ہم اس سے کوئی نتیجہ نہ حاصل کر سکے۔

(۷) ”انڈین ہسٹری کانگریس“ کی پانچویں میقات (۱۹۱۷ء) منعقدہ حیدرآباد (دکن) میں سٹرایم اے لے ایورو (M. A. Lehuraux) نے ایک مضمون

”ڈوپلے فتح آباد کی دریافت“ (The finding of the Site of Duplex Fathabad) پڑھا تھا، ہم نے اسے بھی دیکھا ہے جس شہر سدرجات پر متحیر رہے کہ مضمون نگار بعض مغربی تاریخوں کی مطبائی کے کس قدر زیر اثر ہیں۔ انھوں نے اپنی تحقیق سے جو مقام نام زد کیا ہے اس کا خلاصہ یہ ہے کہ :-

”ولی میڈونپٹ“ (Velmedonpet) جو جنوبی ارکاٹ کے تعلقہ ”ٹندی وائم“ (Tindivanam) تعلق رکھتا ہے کے شمال میں ٹندی وانہ واندلی واش روڈ پر پتیسویں سنگ میل سے کسی قدر چلی طرف ”پٹانندل“ (Puttanandal) کے موضع میں مقام زیر بحث واقع ہے۔ یہیں جنوبی رخ پر سا بنے کی جانب ایک چھوٹا سا سطح میدان ہے، جو کسی زمانہ میں مسلمانوں کا قبرستان تھا۔ لیکن قبروں کے نشانات عرصہ ہوا کہ مٹ گئے۔ اسی رخ پر ”شولٹری“ (Choultry) کی جانب مشہور روایتی تالاب ”کمارا پاکولم“

(Komarappakulam) واقع ہے۔

بہر حال اس انکشاف کو ہماری تاریخوں کے متذکرہ بیانات کی

بھی روشنی میں مقامی طور پر پہنچ کر تصدیق و تحقیق کرنی ہوگی جس کا کہ امنوس ہے ہم کو اب تک موقع نہ مل سکا۔

منظر جنگ کا پانڈی چری | دکنی تاریخیں لکھتی ہیں کہ منظر جنگ، نواب ناصر جنگ کے مارے جانے کے بعد تین روز میں دوسری مرتبہ داخلہ تک اسی میدان میں ٹھہرے رہے۔ چوتھے

دن ۱۹ محرم شعبہ کو وہ پھلجری (پانڈی چری) روانہ ہوئے۔ اور انگریزی تاریخوں سے، دس بارہ روز یہیں قیام ثابت ہوتا ہے چنانچہ یہ بیان کرتی ہیں کہ ۶ دسمبر کو جدید نواب فرانسیسی آبادی (یعنی پانڈی چری کے علاقے) میں ایک فتح اور دہلی ملک کی شان سے داخل ہوئے۔ اور اسی زمین کی ۱۲ تاریخ کو انھوں نے اپنا پہلا دربار منعقد کیا جس میں مغل سرداروں اور ڈوہلے کی نذریں قبول کیں۔

لایا گیا، وہ (۱۸) صندوق جواہرات، ایک کروڑ اثرفیاں اور روپے نقد (جو غیر مسکوک تھے) پر مشتمل تھا۔ اس کے علاوہ سارے شہر میں محلوم ہوتا تھا کہ روپیہ پھوٹ پڑا ہے۔ کوئی متنفس باقی نہ تھا جسے کافی مقدار میں مال ہاتھ نہ لگا ہو۔

اس دولت کی نسبت ہمیں ایک فرانسیسی سرجن کا بھی بیان ملتا ہے جو سال دیرھ سال بعد کا ہے، لیکن اس وقت تک بھی اس مال غنیمت کی فراوانی، اور بے پناہ مقدار کا اندازہ کیا جاسکتا ہے۔

یہ سہ ماہی میں پانڈی چری سے لکھتا ہے:-

”جو لوگ دکن جاتے ہیں، وہ دولت مند ہو جاتے ہیں، کوئی شخص

خالی ہاتھ نہیں آتا۔ ام ولسنس (میڈم ڈوپے کا بیٹا) ۴۰ ہزار

اشرفیاں، جو ہر ایک سو روپے کی ہے، اور بے شمار گولڈ اسکے روپے

جو اہرات لے کر واپس آیا ہے ام کرو جین ڈوپے کا بھتیجا بھی اسی قدر

مال دار ہو کر پہنچا ہے، اسی لیے ہر شخص حیدر آباد جانے کا آرزو مند ہے۔“

منظر جنگ پانڈی چری | فرانسیسی کمپنی کے مقاصد کے لیے، اور اسی کے
پہلو پہ پہلو شخصی طور پر ڈوپے کے واسطے بھی
استقامت اس منظر

بنی ہوئی تھی۔ نمایش پسند گورنر صاحب بہادر کچھ اپنی افتاد طبع سے مجبور
ور کچھ سیاسی مصلح پیش نظر کہ اس وقت نواب صاحب کو جس قدر
سکتا ہے ان تدابیر میں کوئی کسر اٹھانہ رکھی جائے۔

اسی لیے ”سرتی تقاریب“ کے رنگ برنگ دام بچھنے شروع ہوئے۔ جس میں یہ
بذیب بھی کار فرما تھا کہ امراء، رؤسا، دیگر نوابان ہند، اور بالخصوص نواب مظفر جنگ

سرتی تقاریب پر سب سے زیادہ توجہ دینی چاہیے۔ یہ سب
یوں تو ہر روز کسی نہ کسی عنوان سے تقاریب کا سلسلہ جاری تھا۔ لیکن سب
سے بڑا جوش منایا گیا، اس کی آتش بازی کی تفصیل سے، دیگر لوازم کا
اندازہ کیجئے۔

کہتے ہیں کہ اس آنے والے دن کی ہسرت کا
 مہینوں پہلے سے تعین کر لیا گیا تھا، اسی بنا پر
عجبوہ روزگار اتبازی وضاحت کے ساتھ مورخین لکھتے ہیں کہ تین ماہ

دورین لڑائیاں پوری ہیں تو اندازہ ہوا ہے کہ دسوں سے زیادہ
 حیلہ سے ناصر جنگ کو قتل کر دینے کا بیڑا اٹھایا تھا۔ اور ان کو ناصر جنگ
 کے ساتھ غداری کر کے اپنا آلہ کار بننے والے آصفی سرداروں کی نسبت
 اس معاملہ دغا میں وفادار رہنے پر کس قدر بھروسہ تھا۔ ڈوپے کے
 شہرہ آفاق طریق کار کا بھی یہ واقعہ ایک مثال سمجھا جائے گا جس کے

اس طرح اس قدر اسباب کی پوری سی پوری تاریخ
 نوع باقی رہ گئی ہو۔ ہم جزئیات کا تذکرہ نہیں کریں گے۔ گورنری ایوان
 کی آرائش و زیبائش، شہر و قلعہ پانڈی چری کی تزئین و آرائش، جنگلوں
 اور عمارتوں کی رنگارنگ روشنیوں اور ان کی جگمگاہٹ سے بھی
 نظریں ہٹا لینی چاہتے ہیں، جو آپ کو خفیہ نویسوں کی ڈائریوں اور روزناموں
 وغیرہ سے مل جائیں گی۔ آپ کے سامنے صرف اس عجبوہ روزگار نادرتین
 آتش بازی کا تذکرہ کریں گے جس کی نسبت سمجھا جاتا ہے کہ یہ ہندوستان
 کی تاریخ میں ایک اچھوتی اور بہت ہی عظیم الشان آتش بازی تھی۔

ہماری "تاریخ راحت افزا" کی زبان اس کی تعریف میں لال ہے
 وہ لکھتی ہے کہ اس میں فن کاروں نے لٹکا پر، راول کی چڑھائی کا منظر

چھپا رکھا تھا، جب نواب مظفر جنگ، ڈوپلے کی کوٹھی میں پہنچے تو ان سے ایک ”بارودی بندر“ کو اپنے ہاتھ سے روشن کرنے کی فرمائش کی گئی، اس کا سلگنا ہی تھا کہ یہ بندر اُن کے پاس سے اُچک کر، اس احاطہ پر جا پہنچا۔ جس کو لنکا قرار دیا گیا تھا، جس میں غالباً بارودی جنگلے اور مکان وغیرہ بنائے گئے تھے۔ یہ ایک ایک کو روشن کرتا جاتا تھا۔ یہاں تک کہ سارا جزیرہ، نظر فریب مختلف روشنیوں سے جگمگا اٹھا اور وہ نظارہ آنکھوں کے سامنے پیش تھا، جو لنکا پر راون کی ”سپاہ میہون“ نے کیا تھا، اور سارے جزیرے کو آتشیں بنا دیا تھا، سارے دیکھنے والے کہتے ہیں اور حیران تھے، اور مورخ، کاریگروں کے اس بے پناہ کمال کی ندرت دیکھ کر جن تاثرات کا اظہار کرتا ہے، اس کے الفاظ کی مختصر طور پر یوں ترجمانی کی جاسکتی ہے۔

خاتمہ انگشت ہنداں کہ اسے کیا کہیے ناطقہ سر بہ گریباں کہ اسے کیا کہیے
 مظفر جنگ کے انعام اس جشن کے ضیافتی دربار میں نواب صاحب نے ڈوپلے کو مظفر جنگ کا اور اس کی بیوی کو
 ”جہاں آراء بیگم“ کا خطاب عطا کیا۔
 جس کو مغربی مورخین بگاڑ کر کے جوہا نا بیگم لکھتے اور جس کی عقلمندی کی دستاویز بیان کرتے ہیں۔ گورنر کو ایک خلعت فاخرہ بھی مرحمت کی، جس کو پہننے کے لیے ڈوپلے اسی وقت اٹھا اور زیب بدن کیا۔ فوراً حاضر دربار ہو کر مسلمان امراء کی طرح، نواب صاحب کی خدمت میں سلام بجالایا۔

دربارِ دہلی میں 'نواب مظفر جنگا نے' نواب ناصر جنگ کے
مارے جانے، اور ان کی بجائے اپنے مندرجین
مظفر جنگ کی عرضداشت ہونے کے واقعات پر مشتمل ایک طعاعی

عرضداشت، دربارِ دہلی میں احمد شاہ بادشاہ کی خدمت میں بھیجی۔
جو شاید یہیں (پانڈی چری) سے روانہ کی گئی تھی۔ دکن کی ساری تانہیں
اس کے ذکر سے خاموش ہیں۔ آصف جاہ، ناصر جنگ، شاہ نواز خاں
موسوی خاں میرمنشی یا دیگر امراء وغیرہ کے خطوط کے جو مجموعے موجود اور
ملتے ہیں، ان میں سے کسی میں بھی اس عرضی کا پتہ نہیں چلتا۔ ہمارا قیاس
ہے کہ دربارِ دہلی، چندا صاحب، گورنر پانڈی چری، دیگر امراء اور
نوابوں سے مظفر جنگ نے جو مراسلت کی ہوگی، اس کا کہیں نہ کہیں
کوئی مکمل مجموعہ، یا اس کا کوئی حصہ ملنا چاہیے۔ یا یہ جن کے نام موسوم تھے
اور بھیجے گئے تھے، ان کے اپنے مکتوبات کے مجموعوں میں ان کی نقلیں
ضرور دست یاب ہو سکیں گی۔ اسی تصور کی بناء پر ایک عرصہ سے ہماری

تلاش جاری ہے، تاکہ ان کو حاصل کر کے، خود مظفر جنگ کے نقطہ نظر سے واقعات پر غور کرنے کا موقع مل جائے۔ جن سے بہت سے نئے تاریخی انکشافات کی بھی توقع ہے۔ سات آٹھ برس کی جست و جوئی ہم ایک مجموعہ سے صرف ایک ہی عرضی پاسکے۔ جس وقت ہمیں یہ دستیاب ہوئی تو ہماری مسرت اندازہ سے باہر تھی۔ وہی عرضداشت ہاتھ آئی، جو انہوں نے بعد شہادت ناصر جنگ، مغل شہنشاہ کی خدمت میں بھیجی۔

بہر حال ہم ”دکن ہسٹری کانفرنس“ کی اس پامالی میقات

(The First Session of Deccan History Conference)

(۱۹۴۵ء) میں اس نادر ترین تاریخی تحفہ کو پیش کر رہے ہیں جو پہلی دفعہ اُس کے جلسہ سگالا (ایسٹ) سے منظر عام پر لائی جا رہی ہے۔

The Madhwa Monks and popular singers of the Deccan before the 18th century

BY

PROF S HANUMANTH RAO, M.A., (HYDERABAD)

Professor Sri Ram Sharma in his Sectional Presidential address of the sixth session of the Indian History Congress, 1943, asked us to make a systematic and comprehensive study of the lives of the Hindu and Muslim saints and the titles of these saints as a part of the history of the people. I propose, in this paper, to present a study of one important branch of the great Vaishnavite movement, whose founder was Madhwa, (1238 to 1318 A.D.) Born near Mangalore, on the west coast of the Deccan, of poor parents, he was sent at an early age to the monastery of Achyuta-preksha, for his education. This event is confirmed by inscriptional evidence. Madhwa attained conspicuous success as a scholar and debater, chose to enter the order of Monks and travelled widely, all over India. He composed his commentaries on the Bhagawad Gita, the Vedanta Sutra and the Upanishads, embodying his own contribution to the interpretation of the tradition of the past. A belief in the existence of God who is the originator, sustainer and destroyer of the universe, who is full of excellent attributes and free from all faults, who pervades through every conceivable atom of the universe and without whose will, not a blade of grass can move. The individual soul can never become identical with God but some can by continued faith and devotion and constant association with saints and mystics obtain the capacity of God realisation, even in this life. That this achievement is possible only through the medium of a prophet or messenger of God. The followers of Madhwa believed and continue to believe that he was messenger of God, like the Bodhisatva, in the Mahayanist thought.

The most important and almost contemporaneous source of our knowledge about Madhwa is a Sanskrit biography, known as Madhwa Vijaya. It gives us a striking picture of this personality and the magnetic influence that he was able to exercise on his contemporaries. It is no exaggeration to say that he was the pioneer of a reforming movement in Hinduism, which profoundly influenced the people of South India and the Deccan for nearly 400 years and inspired the medieval renaissance in Maharashtra.

Bengal and Punjab. The Bengal tradition of Chaitanya acknowledges its indebtedness to the teaching of Madhwa and his followers. Inscriptions evidence confirms Madhwa's travels in the Andhra or Telingana. One of his followers, Narahari held important administrative offices in the Kalinga country, near Vizagapatam, defeated an attack of the wild Sabara tribes, adorned the hill shrine at Simha hellum, with ornamental pavilions, but was compelled, by political revolution to leave the country and gather round the city of Kampli or Anegundi, the nucleus of the city of Vijayanagara. Like the movement of Ramanuja, which exercised a great influence on the Hoysala Rulers of the Decan, the movement of Madhwa gathered into its fold the rulers of Kalinga. If Bittideva became a Vishnuvardhana, Arjuna, Anuamiraja and Mankaditya became Narasimhavardhana, Gopalavardhana and Sitrangavardhana. Madhwa travelled from Kalinga to Kakatiya, probably in the time of Queen Rudramamba and had several followers, like Padmanabha. Some time later, he travelled through Maharashtra, probably during the reign of the Yadava King Mahadeva of Devagiri. Thence, he proceeded to Delhi. His biographer tells us that Madhwa met the ruler of Delhi and was able to converse with him in his own language and impress him with the peacefully nature of his mission. It is probable that Balban was the ruler, whom Madhwa met. We need not dismiss this as a conjecture. It is said that Babar took Nanak to his tent, that Humayun went to Angad, that Akbar walked barefooted to Amardas, that Nurjahan had several interviews with Hari Govind. The Muslim mystics, Mian Mir, Shah Hussain and Baka Shah were on intimacy with Arjun. The historian Barni tells us that Hindus and Musulmans came from distances of one or two hundred kos to see the splendour of Balban's court. From Delhi, Madhwa returned through Bengal to South India.

One of the important reforms connected with the name of Madhwa, is the abolition of animal sacrifices in religious ceremonial. Both Ramanuja and Madhwa strongly condemned this practice. Here is an instance of the Buddhisng of Hinduism.

Another important reform was the insistence on simplicity in temple worship and absolute celibacy of the monks, who conducted the worship. The temple of Krishna, at Udipi, near Mangalore, became a centre of scholarship and the object of devotional fervour.

They have given the same kind of solace to the suffering as the sayings of Epictetus or Marcus Amelius. They have not merely provided a means of escape but also of fulfilment, to those whose heart-beat was really in harmony with the heart beat of the world. There are moments of silent prayer when even for a few minutes, the saint enters into communion with the spirit of the universe and what he utters in those moments of his "Life Divine" are words that move masses of men and women to leave "the beaten track and strike upward to unsciled heights" Such are the moments that produce the hymns in praise of God. Only a few scholars can appreciate the commentaries on the Upanishads, the Sutras and the Bhagwad Gita. Every one is thrilled by the music of the hymns. The movement of Bhakti or devotion is in no sense a negative movement of escapism or defeatism. Ranaide traces the national revival in Maharashtra to the saints of Maharashtra. The Maharashtra saints, beginning with Dyhaneswar and his sister, Muktabai, composed soul-stirring psalms that converted thousands of people to the cult of devotion. Chaitanya is said to have written not a single work but yet electrified the atmosphere of Bengal, with his devotional ecstasies. All the Canarese speaking people, whether they are the doctrinal followers of Madhwa or not, are inspired by the sixteenth century's Canarese psalmists, Purandara Dasa and Kanaka Dasa. Almost every day we listen from the South Indian stations the music of Purandara Dasa on the air.

Puran Singh, speaking of the inspiration derived from Guru Nanak, writes "Nanak is still with us, his eyes meet ours, his feet we touch, his figure flits before us, his voice still sings in our ears, he is a song and a book" Almost in identical terms, Madhwa's biographer's father praises his master Madhwa, "Thou art verily my mother, Thou art the father, my friend and companion, Thou art my all-in-all. Endow me with an ever-increasing, unselfish and unpretentious life of devotion to you and to God" Like the followers of Nanak, the followers of Madhwa believe that Madhwa is still with them and repeat every day the above praise.

For over a period of half a century, Madhwa fought against a mere conformity to ritual, that made no appeal to the heart. He made philosophy conform to the inner experience of the human soul. He proclaimed to his followers, that the true approach of God does not lie in the elaborate sacrifices to the fire or the correct repetition of the hymns or the mere ringing of bells before the image of God. He inspired them with a vision of the divine in man. His appeal was not confined to the cloister and the forest or the Brahman and the priest. Kalyana Devi was the first of a long line of women saints in the Canarese country, that has not yet become completely extinct. Kanaka Dasa was one of the prominent non-brahmin saints that derived his inspiration from Madhwa and is honoured by the most orthodox clergyman as a saint. There are the apostolic successors of the monasteries established by Madhwa, some of whom, outstanding personalities in the history of religion and scholarship, have preserved the traditions scholarship in their monasteries. More numerous are the saints who are no scholiasts, who never cared to obtain publicity as debaters, who led the simple ordinary life of busy men of the world but yet who were possessed with a divine inspiration and whose passionate lyrics to God, to Madhwa and to the long line of Masters that followed him provide an everlasting solace, a hope and a faith, a faith that enables the weary traveller in life to feel at least for a moment, that even on this earth, he can feel himself as if in heaven.

Political power in the Deccan of the fourteenth century was divided between the Bahmani Sultans and the Vijayanagara kings but the cultural activities of the Madhwa monks were extended over the whole area, irrespective of political changes.

Anegondi, at present one of the feudatory Samasthans of H.E.H the Nizam, was the nucleus out of which arose the city of Vijayanagara. About 1310 A.D. power was in the hands of Vira Kampila Deva, who extended his territory in all directions. To the east and south of Anegondi, flows the River Tungabhadra. To the south of the river are the famous ruins of Hampi, the present name of the former Vijayanagara. There is a small island, splitting the Tungabhadra into two branches, near Anegondi, where we find an enclosure with nine tombs in it. By the side of it is a big cave where the saints are said to have spent their lives in meditation. One of the nine tombs is that of Padmanabha the pontifical successor of Madhwa from 1318 to 1324. He was the author of a Sanskrit work, Sanyaya Ratnavali.

About a mile from the island, towards the Hampi village is, another rock island, in the middle of the river. There is the tomb of Narahari Tirtha. He is regarded as the founder of the Dasakuta or groups of singers in the language of the people.* A knowledge of Sanskrit was no longer necessary to understand the religion of Madhwa. That was a great revolution, similar to the translation of the Bible from Latin into English, on the eve of the European Reformation.

The town of Malkhed, in H.E.H the Nizam's Dominions was the ancient Manyakheta, the Capital of Rashtrakuta Kings. There is an old fort on the River Kagine. The Madhwa monks, Akshobhya and Jaya Tirtha (1350-1367 and 1367-1388) made Malkhed, their residence. The first dynasty of Vijayanagara showed special favour to the school of Vidyaranya. Vidyaranya was the professor of Advaita, Vedanta, Desika of Visishtadwaita. The latter played the part of an empire in a famous intellectual combat, between Akshobhya of the Dwaita school, and Vidyaranya of the Advaita school. The contest took place at Mulabagal, the capital of Kennara Kampana, the son of Bukka I, king of Vijayanagara. The eclecticism of the period is evidenced by the records of similar disputations between the Jains and the Vaishnavas.

Jayatirtha was the second outstanding personality in the history of the Madhwa religion, after its founder, Madhwa. His is a remarkable career, like that of Buddha. Born in a wealthy Mahatta family of princes, he enjoyed all that birth and wealth could give. Something happened to turn him away from all worldly glory and he entered the holy orders and became a disciple of Akshobhya. His Sanskrit work Nyaya Sudha is considered as a masterpiece of Madhwa philosophy. According to tradition, Vidyaranya paid a visit to the cave at Yeragola near Malkhed, where Jaya Tirtha was busy with his literary work, was impressed with his scholarship and carried him on an elephant in procession. For more than a hundred years Malkhed remained a flourishing centre of this movement and attracted several monks and scholars. Thousands of pilgrims gather from all parts of South India to honour the memory of Jayatirtha at Malkhed every year, about the month of July.

The second dynasty of Vijayanagara bestowed special patronage to the monks of the Madhwa religion. Saluva Narasimha extended his favours to Sri Padaraya, the head of the Mulabagal monastery. Sri Padaraya composed hundreds of musical compositions in the Canarese language and spread the vernacular movement considerably. The temple of Venkatachalapathi, on the hill at Tirupathi, received great attention from the Saluva kings and their generals. Sri Padaraya asked his distinguished pupil, Vyasaraya, to go to Vijayanagara. Vyasaraya became the chief adviser of the Vijayanagara king, Krishna Devaraya. Vyasaraya's place in the history of Vijayanagara is well described by a contemporary poet Somanatha, whose work is rendered into English by Mr. Venkoba Rao of the Mysore Civil Service. Vyasaraya was holding the highest ecclesiastical position at Tirupathi, for 12 years and that is the chief reason for the particular reverence shown by the Madhwas to the present day, to the temple at Tirupathi. During the period of Krishna Devaraya, the Vaishnavism of Ramanuja and Madhwa, obtained royal patronage. Vyasaraya gathered a large number of scholars around him. He wrote several glosses on the commentaries of Madhwa's works and is regarded as third in eminence in the history of the Madhwa religion, after its founder and Jaya Tirtha, the great commentator. Vyasaraya obtained royal honours. He was described as the Lord seated on the Karnataka throne. About 1500 A.D. the right of flying a green flag on a camel was conferred on the monastery of Vyasaraya. When Krishna Devaraya left Vijayanagara to conduct a campaign, Vyasaraya was actually discharging the duties of kingship and coins were issued in his honour.

It was at his suggestion that the construction of the most beautiful temple at Hampi—the temple of Vithala, was started

The period of Vyasaraya, the sixteenth century, was a period of reformation all over the world. In India, it was the period of Chaitanya in Bengal and of Kali in Northern India. Vyasaraya gathered round him men of all classes and castes. Purandara, the merchant and Kanaka, the out-caste, were among the most famous of his disciples.

One of the most interesting temples, among the ruins at Hampi is that of Yantrodharaka Hanuman, engraved on a rock in a geometrical pattern of intersecting triangles within a circle, a detailed description of which is given in the Report of the Southern circle of Archaeology—for 1918-19. Interesting icons of Hanuman, the messenger of Rama, Bhima, the strong fighter against the forces of evil and Madhwa, teacher of wisdom are also to be found among the ruins. Some of them are very rare.

One of the disciples of Vyasaraya was Purandara Dasa. His father was a wealthy diamond merchant. He was married and had four sons. Like Jayatitha he abandoned his wealth, migrated to Vijayanagara and became a follower of Vyasaraya. The name of Purandara is a household word to all lovers of music and song in South India and the Deccan. There is a hall or Mantap on the banks of the River Tungabhadra at Hampi, which is pointed out as the pavilion, where Purandara conducted his song recitals. Though not a scholar, endowed with book learning, Purandara was one of those whom Ariabindo would describe as a gnostic being. To such a being, caste has no meaning—such a being, having achieved wholeness in himself, looks at the universe as a whole. Purandara and his colleagues the Haridasas of the 16th century, played an important part in that reintegration that was so much needed in the India of the 16th century. Both Purandara and Kanaka lived long and profoundly influenced the life of the people of South India and the Deccan.

Another disciple of Vyasaraya who belongs to the history of the 16th century was Vadijala. He travelled widely all over India and his pilgrim travels, the Itihasa Prabhandam, is a valuable record. He popularised the worship of Hayagriva the God bearing the head of a horse, with 4 hands, holding the couch, the rosary, the book and the Jnanamudra (thumb and middle finger touching each other), the symbol of imputing knowledge. He is the god of learning and wisdom, as Saraswati is the goddess of learning—He was also a great scholar in Sanskrit and Canarese. He introduced several reforms in the conduct of worship, in the temple at Udupi. He converted the goldsmiths of Canara to Vaishnavism. He composed songs in the Tulu language—one of the dialects of Canara. He emphasised the importance of a fortnightly fast, which is held in considerable importance by the followers of this sect. He popularised the essential teachings of Madhwa, in his Canarese work, Maha Bhārata Tatparya Nūnaya. The Canarese songs and the Tatparya Nūnaya of Vadiraja, enable men and women, ignorant of the Sanskrit language, to understand the essentials of Madhwaism.

The most conspicuous of the Madhwa monks and scholars of the 17th century is Raghavendra (601–1671 A D). His tomb is situated on the banks of the River Tungabhadra, in the extreme north of the Adoni Taluq in the District of Bellary. An annual festival is held in the month of August, which attracts pilgrims from all parts of South India. The Muslim governor of Adoni from 1662 to 1667, made the grant of the landed endowment attached to the tomb. After the cession of those territories to the British, there was some difficulty about the continuance of the endowment. The District Gazetteer of Bellary mentions an incident connected with the popular collector of Bellary, Sir Thomas Munro, who ended his career as the governor of Madras. Munro went to the village to make enquiries. "After removing his boots and taking off his hat he approached the grave. The saint thereupon emerged from the tomb and met him. They conversed together for some time regarding the resumption but though the saint was visible and audible to Munro—who was himself, the people declare, semi-divine none of the others who were there could either see him or hear what he said. The discussion ended, Munro returned to his tent and quashed the proposal to resume the endowment." Sir Thomas Munro captured the imagination of the people of the ceded districts and is remembered to the present day as the father of the people.

Raghavendra was the fourth great personality in the Madhwa tradition, after Madhwa, Jayatirtha and Vyasaraya. He wrote several glosses on the works of his predecessors. Simplicity and directness are the qualities of his works. He obtained great reputation for his healing powers. His relics are carried to several places in South India and Brindavanas or Stupas are constructed over them. Successive generations of men and women have kept his memory green, by their praises and hymns.

PART II.

The Nabobs of Savanur in the 18th century and their ministers extended their patronage to Madhwa monks and singers. We have seen that of all the Puranas the Bhagavatha made a special appeal to the Vaishnavas all over India. Several commentaries have been written and several selections have been made, of such verses as are most appealing to the emotions. One of the saints of the eighteenth century, Jayatirtha or Vishnu Tirtha was born in the village of Siddapur, near Savanur. His father's name was Balachurya and mother's name Bhagirathi. His year of birth was 1756 A.D. After upanayana or investiture with the sacred thread he was sent to Aji Acharya for his education. Aji is a village in Gadwal. He (Aji) is the author of a devotional work Mandanandini in sanskrit, a commentary on the Bhagawatha. He lived from 1704 to 1800 A.D. After his period of education, Vishnu Tirtha returned home, led the life of a householder for some time and entered holy orders, being initiated by monk Satyavara. He refused to bear the burdens of pontifical office and led the simple life of a scholar, in a secluded place at Munupalle village on the banks of the Malaprahara river. He obtained celebrity as an able exponent of Nyaya Suddha and was the author of several sanskrit works, like Bhagawatha Sarodhara, Shodasi, Chaturdasi and Adhyatma Rasa Ranjani. He died in 1806 A.D.

The Sarodhara is published. The others are in manuscript. The Bhagawatha Purana contains 12 books and 344 chapters. Vishnu Tirtha has selected 367 verses and rearranged them, with his own commentary in simple and appealing sanskrit and brought out the essential teaching of this most popular Purana. The Bhagawatha Dharma or code of conduct, as developed by his interpretation, makes a universal appeal like the Buddha Dharma. In my paper on Buddhism in the Deccan, I have drawn some parallels between the Buddha Dharma and Bhagawatha Dharma. The problem is the same. What is the good life and how to attain it? Good life is not the monopoly of those who are born in a particular caste. Good life is not the result of mere book learning. The mere performance of sacrifices to the fire is of no avail. Faith in one's mission in life and the performance of one's duty, undeterred by weal or woe, are the means of fulfilling the moral law. The example of several kings like Bali, Rahugana Muchukunda and Priyavrata is quoted to illustrate the inefficacy of a forest life as a wandering monk, if the passions are not subdued, and the efficacy of a householder's life, if service takes the place of selfishness. We are asked to place duty above pleasure, to take time by the forelock, to derive inspiration from the lives of great men, who possess equanimity (Sampachjitat), who are free from anger (Vinanyasah) and who are kind to all (Suhundah) The good man should neither indulge in self praise nor condemn the great ones, the Bhagawathas. It is pride and jealousy that makes us condemn others. The great ones are not affected by our insults. It is only ourselves that suffer for the wrong.

The ethical code prescribed here is not different from the disinterested action taught in the Gita or the life of action taught in Upanishads, where you are asked to live a hundred years performing actions. Neither the Buddha Dharma nor the Bhagawatha Dharma taught us inaction. Both insist on a rigid discipline, a severe and systematic training of the soul, as important as the training of the body and the training of the mind, for the fullest development of the personality of the individual. Obedience to parents and elders, study and learning, association with the wise and service to them, self-denial, absence of self-praise, not finding fault with others, endurance, equanimity, contentment, sincerity, the will to give more than the will to get, are all qualities, that can be acquired by training the will to obtain them and are the means by which a few highly developed individuals may be able to obtain that illumination which is the goal of perfection. For the rest the training is of value in enabling them to perform their duties, in whatever station of life, time and environment have placed them, most efficiently, as if under the great Task Master's eye. Vishnu Tirtha sums up the essence of the teaching of Bhagawatha as follows —“ Full of unalloyed devotion to God, full of devotion to the devotees of God according to their rank, abandoning all worldly desires, not reviling others or flattering oneself, calmly enduring with patience the ups and downs of life, realising that all words and sounds primarily describe and denote, God, diverting the mind, speech, bodily activity towards God, abandoning greed, jealousy and anger, realising that God is within you and endows you with intellect and prompts you to action, that He is also without you, bestowing the fruits of all knowledge and action, that He is the Doer, the enjoyer and the lord of all senses, constantly thinking of Him in all conditions of life, while standing, sitting or resting—even if such a man remains a householder, he does not render himself liable to a rebirth ”.

The Nabobs of Karnatak and their officers also extended their patronage to the Madhwa saints of the 18th century. Political rivalries in South India of the 18th century, did not act as a hindrance to the free cultural activity of groups of these monks. Satyapriya, Satyabodha and Satyasandha the successive heads of a monastery, travelled throughout the Deccan and South India. Satyapriya obtained grants of villages from three Rajas of Peddapuram, in the Godavari District, for the maintenance of scholars and the propagation of sanskrit learning Sri Vidwat Timma Jagapathi Manaraji, 1760-1797 was a great patron of letters and welcomed scholars to his court. Poet praised his love of learning.

Vatsa Vaya Timma Bhupala Naruniyandu

Monk Satyasandha was held in highest esteem by the Raja of Vijayanagara in the Northern Circars.

The Sumasthan of Gadwal in H E H the Nizam's Dominions is full of interest to students of Madhwa religion and history. The chiefs of Gadwal were great patrons of Sanskrit, Telugu and Canarese learning. The Raichur Doab, between the River Tungabhadra and River Krishna produced numerous palmists and singers from among the followers of Madhwa. Many of them were simple, unsophisticated villagers. They had no advantage of scholarship or any systematic intellectual training. They bear comparison, not to the Pandits of Benares but to mystics, like Kabir or Chaitanya. They were scattered all around Gadwal in the villages of Aiji, Rajoli, Venisompur, Darui, Chintavehi, Sankapuram, Madanikallu, Uttanur and Bichpalli. Mention has already been made of the scholar of Aiji, to whom, Vishnu Tirtha was sent for his education. His teacher, Monk Bhuvanendia lived at Rajoli. Two of the popular singers, Tummanna and Mohana lived in the villages of Uttanur and Sankapuram. The singer, Seshadasa was a Patwarri at Darui. The best known among them were Vijaya Dasa, 1687 to 1755 and Jagannatha Dasa 1727 to 1809. Vijaya Dasa was born at Chikalpari in Manvi Taluqa of the Raichur District. The village is situated on the River Tungabhadra. He died at Chippaguri, 5 miles from the Guntakal Railway Station. Jagannatha Dasa was born in a village called Byagavathi, Manvi Taluqa, Raichur District. Unlike Vijaya Dasa, who suffered poverty, Jagannatha Dasa belonged to a Kulkarni family and received education in Sanskrit and Canarese. His Harkathamithasara, or the essence of the Nectar of the stories of God is a very popular and inspiring book, expounding the teachings of Madhwa in musical Canarese verse. If Vishnu Tirtha's Sarodhara conveys in simple and appealing Sanskrit prose the steps leading to Illumination, Jagannatha Dasa's Harkathamithasara and his songs and psalms in equally simple and beautiful Canarese describe the qualities of those Bhagawathas, who have obtained the Illumination. "They are not aware of any god except the one God. To the outside world, they appear as deaf and dumb and foolish people. They entertain no crooked thoughts. Victory and defeat, profit, and loss, honour and dishonour, safety and danger, happiness and misery, gold and clay, the beautiful and the ugly, praise and insult are equally acceptable to them as gifts from God. They are free from the shackles of desire, anger, jealousy and passion. They never forget to perform their allotted duty, in conformity with the time and place, in which their lots are cast. They are respected by all. They are immersed in joyful bliss. They laugh they weep they dance. Their mind is never away from God'. This is one of the most popular songs in the Canarese country even to this day. Jagannatha Dasa was held in the highest esteem by Purniah, Diwan of Mysore under Tipu Sultan.

The essence of the teaching of all those saints was that caste is not merely a matter of birth but of character and that the lower forms of worship should give place to the worship of the One Highest God.

The movement of the Haridasas or the popular singers is one of the most living faiths in the Deccan. Lingsugur, in H. E. H. the Nizam's Dominions was the residence of a group of these singers in the 19th century. There are several in Mysore to the present day. Some of them have received education in English and have held the highest positions in the public service. The religious movement of Madhwa was never a disruptive movement. It was not militant in its activities. It received the support of the rulers, both Hindu and Muslim. It played an important part in the social and administrative system of South India and the Deccan for nearly 300 years. Most liberal endowments were made to the monasteries of this sect, by the Hindu and Muslim Rulers of South India and the Deccan. Several of them continue to enjoy the endowments to the present day. The administrative services rendered by some of these Madhwa families, two hundred or three hundred years ago are evidenced by the survival of the official names, prefixed to their personal names. Pheelkhana Majumdar, Bakshi, Pharsee and Baru indicate that these offices were held by them, almost on a hereditary basis. The Madhwa movement was a socio-religious-cultural movement of the middle ages creating a new integration of life and giving an impetus to its followers to fresh movements of creative activity, absorbing and synthesising the various cultural forces that were brought to bear, on the life of the people of South India and the Deccan, from the beginning of the 14th century.

Some Poona Akhbars in the Daftar-e-Divani

Daftar e-Divani & Mal, (Hyderabad-Dn)

AN ambitious monarch has always to keep himself fully informed regarding the activities of the neighbouring princes so that he can direct an efficient administration for peace and progress of his subjects or prudently plan aggression for conquest of new lands. It is no wonder that the enlightened Nizams of Hyderabad should have established an organization for acquiring such reports from the neighbouring states. Nawab Nizam Ali Khan Bahadur (1762 A.C. to 1803 A.C.) seems to have been deeply interested in securing such reports from Poona and the Daftar-e-Divani of H. E. H. the Nizam's Government possesses a large collection of such Akhbars in the Marathi Section. Thanks are offered to the authorities of the Daftar-e-Divani for their kindness in allowing me to study these Akhbars.

There are some stray letters, like Akhbars, dating from 1763 A.C. but those that start from 1773 A.C., that is after the assassination of Narayan Rao Peshwa and the rise of Nana Farnavis, indisputably display a remarkable efficiency of the reporters. (Narayan Rao was murdered on the 30th of August 1773 A.C. and the earliest Akhbar in the collection is dated the 10th of December 1773) The latest Akhbars refer to the year 1793 A.C. There is one Akhbar even from the Bhonsles of Nagpur and bears the following date 10-1-1792 A.C.

This makes us believe that there were agents of the Nizam at various courts e.g. at Gwalior, at Indore and at Baroda. This also shows that there was a regular organization that was manned and directed most efficiently. In an Akhbar from Poona despatched on the 21st of Moharrum 1191 A.H. i.e. the 1st of March 1777 A.C. there is a reference to instructions received regarding the payment and appointment of messengers and couriers.

"The demanded amount of the arrears of the new carriers till the end of Shawwal has been received. The receipt for Rs 134/8/- out of which three rupees were to be deducted as the discount of the bill has been separately forwarded with a detailed letter etc..... Appointments have been made only for an year."

(From Itihasadarsha :—A Marathi History of Rai Rayan family)

The leading Maratha nobles with the Nizam during these days were the ancestors of the Rai Rayan family. The brothers Dhondaji Shankar (1728-1773 A.C.) and Nanaji Shankar (1730-1785 A.C.) acted as foreign secretaries wherever Maratha States were concerned. They seem to have been trusted diplomats both of Nawab Nizam Ali Khan Bahadur and the Peshwas. Dhondajipunt was made a Daftardar, immediately after the death of his father in 1759 A.C. His services seem to have won progressive favour from his Royal Master. He was granted a Mansab of two hundred rupees on the 26th of January 1767 A.C. An additional Mansab of seven hundred rupees and the title of 'Rai' was conferred upon him on the 24th of May 1767 A.C. Dhondajipunt was awarded a Mansab of a thousand rupees and the title 'Rai Rayan Diyan Ram' on the 22nd of May 1768 A.C. On the 27th of April 1773 A.C. he was entrusted with the responsibility of Naib Divan. His Mansab was being raised progressively. He was titled as 'Diyanatvant' on the 27th of October 1770 A.C. Even the Peshwas have rewarded Dhondaji Ram with grants and Jagirs. Mouje Raipur and Mouje Sangvi in Aurangabad division were conferred as Jagirs on the 27th of April 1763 A.C. and on the 17th of May 1767 A.C. Mouje Lamangaon in Aurangabad division was further granted as Jagir on the 2nd of October 1774 A.C.

The younger brother Nanaji Shankar also seems to have been a very efficient and intelligent politician. He was awarded the Mohriri of four divisions viz Aurangabad, Vijapur, Berais and Khandesh, on the 24th of April 1766 A.C. He was winning more and more Mansabs for successful services. He was granted the title of 'Amanatwant' on the 21st of February 1772 A.C. The Peshwa Madhav Rao I (1761-1772 A.C.) granted him Jagirs of Adgaon and eleven villages on the 9th of March 1762 A.C. On the 17th of May 1767 A.C. he got further Jagir of Mouje Rela in Aurangabad division from the Peshwa. Nanaji Shankar in collaboration with Nawab Vikaruddaula Bahadur led the delegation from Nawab Nizam Ali Khan Bahadur for developing diplomatic relations with the Peshwa. One of the Akhbars despatched from Purandar on the 11th of February 1776 A.C. mentions the fact that they had reached the same day. These Akhbars seem to be penned by half a dozen writers with their own individual differences in the style of writing. But none except one mentions his name and that is Haibat Rao Gopal who always very humbly and respectfully addresses his master the Rai Rayan. In the manuscript collection of the Osmania University could be discovered a fragmentary Modi Bakhar, a chronicle, of the Maratha Rulers. On page 141 of this Bakhar it is stated, "Nawab Nizam Ali Khan Bahadur despatched presents of robes and jewellery to the newly born posthumous Peshwa Sawai Madhav Rao with Nanaji Shankar and Haibat Rao Gopul. When Nanaji returned to Hyderabad he left Haibat Rao Gopul at Poona, to act as news reporter: "Akhbar Nawis".

No doubt a huge number of Marathi documents of the latter half of the eighteenth century are published in the Volumes of the Peshwa Daftar and other series, yet these 'Akhbars' and many other documents scribed under Asaf Jahi influence, must be individualized as a group by itself, displaying a preponderance of Persian and Arabic influence. The Poona 'Akhbars' are so much surcharged with Persian phraseology that even an expert who is 'non mulki' may find it rather difficult to comprehend every word in the 'Akhbar' without a thorough grounding of Persian. But a mulki Marathi, brought up and bred up in the state, cannot find much difficulty in understanding these words, because the Marathi spoken in the state is evolving from the same stock and under the same influence. The fact that reports are generally despatched on Saturdays, Friday being taken up as the week end, shows Asaf Jahi influence. The reporters are very meticulous in reporting events, from Pihai to Pihai and Ghatika to Ghatika, (There are 60 Ghatikas, and 8 Pihais during 24 hours. A Pihai=three hours and a Ghatika=24 minutes.) The places that are closely watched by them are the palace of the Peshwa and the residence of Nana Farnavis, who is generally referred to as the "Madarul-Mahan". The Peshwa during his childhood stayed on the fort at Purandar near Poona, when Purandar alone had become the centre from which radiated all political activities. The Akhbars though styled Poona Akhbars are also from Purandar. Closest attention has been bestowed upon the boy-Peshwa, Madhav Rao II, and Nana Farnavis, the principal man behind the machine. This naturally throws sufficient light on all administration. Generals like Haipunt Phadke, Parashurampunt Patwardhan, Ramachandra Ganesh Kanade, Bhim Rao Panse, Mahadji's Behara, Visajeeput Biniwale and Murai Rao Ghorapade or envoys like Krishna Rao Ballal, Sudashiv Dinkar, Rumi Patil, all had to meet Nana and the Peshwa to get orders and direction. Letters from North India and messages from South India are received at Poona and the news writers report even the contents and gists of these. The reporters always strike a discrimination between a rumour and a fact. Their omnipresence is startling. They will write Nana and Haipunt were tete-a-tete for a 'Pihai' and the object of the confidential meeting could be hunted out as follows: stating the matter in details. Madhav Rao II was invested with the robes of the Peshwa on the 40th day of his birth i.e. the 29th of May 1774 A.C. Nana Farnavis, with his own limitations, was extremely violent regarding the education and upbringing of the Peshwa. The Peshwa used to attend durbars, be present at diplomatic negotiations and also have interviews with Sardars. In an 'Akhbar' despatched from Purandar on the 10th of March 1777 A.C. mention is made that Raghuji Bhosle could not meet Madhav Rao because the latter's mother had mistrusted. The boy of two could not be controlled and governed to stay in the presence of strangers, plucked out from the lap of a mother untouchability being observed during menstruation. Her presence in privacy in the close vicinity was quite necessary. This reminds one of the early rule of Nawab Meer Mahaboob Ali Khan Bahadur Asaf Jah the VI in his childhood under the regency council. The Peshwa was being drilled into orthodox religious discipline. He used to get up early in the morning, then perform Puja and morning Sindhia and hear vocal music. He used to visit the shrine at Parbat daily and practise horse riding exercise in the Ramana, an open and extensive yard for the assemblage of Brahmins at the end of Shriavan, when annually thousands of Brahmins were given Dikshana. Sometimes he proceeded to Parbat with a large retinue of Sardars and their forces. On one occasion the Peshwa was shown a map to explain how Fateh Ali Khan, the general of Haidar suddenly descended the Ghat near Bangalore and frustrated the plans of the English. Mention is made of this in Akhbar dated the 23rd of April 1791 A.C. He practised archery in the palace and took delight in wild animals. Deer and stags were fed under his supervision. In one of the Akhbars there is a reference to the presentation of a wild cat 'Siab Gosh' to the Peshwa. It seems he was delighted in maintaining a representative menagerie. Madhav Rao attended the gymnasium and learnt tricks of wrestling. He was interested in witnessing the combats of wrestlers and feats of acrobats and rewarding them with gold whistles and reference to this is made in an Akhbar dated the 9th of April 1789 A.C. The Peshwa took interest in indoor games like the Chousai, Ganjifa and the chess. The Peshwa fasted on the Ekadashi day and went to Parwati early in the morning and spent an hour or two worshipping the deity. On special occasions he visited other shrines as the Ganapati in the Kasba Peth. On the days of eclipses he observed all the religious injunctions, bathing before and after the eclipse, fasting and giving alms in charity.

It seems that his social life also was being progressively developed. He attended social functions like marriages and sacred thread ceremonies, took part in the music and dancing entertainments, received betels, scents and garlands, offered costly presents to the wedded couples. Akhbars despatched on the 9th of April 1789 A.C. from Poona mentions that the Peshwa visited the residence of Ali Bahadur in honour of the circumcision ceremony of Shamsheer Bahadur and gave suitable presents of robes etc. The Peshwa took profound interest in the Holi celebrations. The Holi comes off on the full moon day of Phalguna but the Akhbar despatched on the 8th of March 1784 says that the jubilant activities were commenced a fortnight earlier. The Holi is a peculiar ceremony amongst the Hindus. The suppressed urge for doing the indecent and the obscene is given a free vent during a day or two. The day following the full moon day is spent in besmearing the bodies especially with ashes and mud and filthy water. On the Rangapanchamy i.e. the 5th day of the dark half of Phalguna coloured water is sprinkled, and sprayed and showered through syringes, the black and red scented powders are dusted and all this is done to the accompaniment of dancing and music. The Peshwa had all his boyish whims freely given vent to,

Nana Phadanavis's personality as reported by the news-writers seems to be very active, intelligent, inquisitive and stern. Nana's direction and scrutiny of accounts and office routine seem to be faultless. Every day Mutsadies, the Mamledars, and the Darakdars connected with Mali and Mulki affairs present themselves and he attends to their work, by himself when at his own residence, and along with the Peshwa when at his palace. He was always accessible to prominent officials and had confidential talks with them. He visited the English envoys, who awaited his arrival, if absent from station. There are references to the fact that at the year end he checked the rolls of Arab guards. He was deeply religious, acted according to religious injunctions even in minutest details. He observed the Ekadashi, fasted on the day and went to the Belbagh early in the morning instead of visiting it in the evening as usual. He also paid homage to various other shrines in Poona. On the eclipse-day he too had bathed before and after the duration of the eclipse and offered alms. Mention is made, in an Akhbar despatched on the 4th of August 1787 A.C., that due to the Dhondavan, a religious ceremony, Nana fed 150 Brahmins in his own house and gave them a half rupee bit each. At the shrine of Jejuri, during a celebration and a few hundreds of pilgrims suddenly died in a day or two. This was explained as the result of divine wrath and official agents were despatched to perform pacificatory rites. He has attended a Hari Keerthan i.e. a devotional recitation of the careers of Awatais and saints. The social aspect of his life also was vigorous. He attended banquets. In one of the Akhbars despatched on the 22nd of August 1777 A.C. mention is made of his having attended a marriage at the residence of Mardan Ali Khan Jagirdar. He was invited to inspect new additions to and constructions of houses. He has gone to condone bereaved parties upon the deaths of their near and dear ones. It can be gathered from reports that he was a great task-master and a stern disciplinarian. Parashuram Bhau Mirajkar wanted leave to go to Nasik due to Sinhasta, a significant stellar position. He flatly refused on the ground that his attention and presence were urgently needed to put a brake to the growing English aggression. He further said that he himself had cancelled his visit to Toke for a religious dip into the Godavari. Fateh Singh Bhonsle of Akkalkot was coming to Poona. This Bhonsle's father was looked upon as adopted son by Shahu and very much regarded by him. The Peshwa himself had gone to meet him on the bank of the Ghasiram-tak with a large retinue of Sardars but Nana was conspicuous by his absence. The Bhonsle brothers had come to meet Nana at his residence. They were under the impression that at least here Nana would come in advance a few steps, to receive them warmly. But Nana was adamant. The Bhonsles had to come and meet him as commoners. At the prolonged Holi celebration in the palace of the Peshwa, the reporters are very clever in noting that Nana attended the music and the dance and left the palace after which started the mud-besmearing and colour spraying activities. It is also reported, Nana used to take some daily medicine and some times he has returned to his residence only to have this and then at once proceeded to the Belabagh.

The Akhbais produce a general impression on the mind of the reader that life at Poona was prosperous and happy. The administration was efficient. Thefts and robberies were taken notice of and the culprits were punished, though according to the crude standards of penalizing as obtained during those days. Three miscreants had murdered some dancing girls at night and absconded with their jewellery. They were searched out and kept in the lock-out. It was discovered that one was totally innocent and he was let off and the two were tied to the legs of elephants and paraded through the city till they died. A fellow was entrusted with the work of preparing a necklace by putting silk bands and threads through pearls. He knocked away the genuine pearls and substituted counterfeit ones. At the discovery of the crime, the head of the fellow was cut off. One of the dignified matrons of the Peshwa household was passing through the bazaar street in a palanquine with a large retinue. Mahalinga Rao Ghorpade, a dignitary of the court was passing by the same road with an advance-guard. There was some jostling on the narrow road which resulted into a light skirmish. The Ghorpade's men were rather high-handed but they had to yield and the lady was safely escorted to the palace. The Sardar was conveyed to Nana's residence by force and was reprimanded for his misbehaviour. But this gives us a peep into the life of the city which seems to be busy and humming.

The political events relate to the English affairs. Raghunath Rao, the younger son of Baji Rao I was a very brave and ambitious person. After the death of his elder brother Balaji Baji Rao, the III Peshwa, in 1761 A.C., Raghunath Rao aspired for the Peshwaship. But his nephew, Madhav Rao I, a boy of sixteen was preferred to him. The young Peshwa proved equal to the task and easily eclipsed his uncle. Madhav Rao died in 1772 A.C., and yet Raghunath Rao could not secure the Peshwaship for himself. Narayan Rao, the brother of Madhav Rao, became the Peshwa.

but unfortunately he was murdered on the 30th of August 1773 A.C. And the general verdict of history runs that Raghunath Rao had a hand in the heinous atrocity. This unscrupulous and dissatisfied member of the Peshwa family was a fertile subject through which to sow dissensions in the Maratha Camp and the eagle-eyed English were quick to mark it. Nawab Nizam Ali Khan Bahadur did not give quarter to Raghunath Rao, on the contrary he recognized the baby-Peshwa by sending presents as mentioned before. The English authorities at Bombay had accurately gauged the situation, due to their vicinity, and had sheltered Raghunath Rao promising to fight for his cause. But Hastings who had become the Governor General and who wanted to concentrate all authority in his own hands disliked that the Bombay Governor should have direct dealings with the Marathas. Hastings wrote to Bombay that their dealings with Raghunath Rao were "unjust, impolitic, dangerous and unauthorized" (Forrest pp 238). Colonel Upton was despatched from Calcutta to Poona to settle the terms of treaty with the Marathas. The English could not abide by the terms and they had posted Moyston at Poona who began to interfere with the Maratha affairs. Nana Farnavis entertained St. Lubin and there is a reference to his stay in one of the Akhbars. This Mons. Lubin had presented a moving picture of the scene of Narayan Rao's murder to the Peshwa Durbar. Nana's motive in welcoming the French gentleman was to belittle the importance of Moyston. There is also mention of Charles Malet and Macpherson. An Akhbar dated the 30th of October 1781 A.C. refers to the fact how Chait Singh defeated Warren Hastings between Benares and Allahabad. In an Akhbar despatched on the 9th of August 1781 A.C., it is reported that an English merchantman laden with cargo worth two lacs was confiscated at Suvarna Durga by the Marathas. At Surat, one of the chaukidars of Raghunath Rao had a clash with an Englishman who died of the wound. The English seized the chaukidar and killed him. Raghunath Rao was afraid of this and ran forty miles away from Surat. This incident is reported in Akhbar' dated the 18th of August 1781 A.C., A French person is reported to have interviewed the Maratha Karbharies and promised on payment of five lacs to strengthen their navy so that they could put down the English. Mention to this is made in Akhbar despatched on the 25th of November 1781 A.C. The movements of the army of General Goddard are frequently reported.

The relations of the Marathas with Haider Ali and Tipu are mentioned in many of the Akhbars. Haider Ali seems to have been extremely ambitious to acquire fresh regions towards the north of his dominions. He was ever watchful to reap benefit from the weaker fold of the Marathas. In an Akhbar despatched on the 11th of February 1776 A.C. it is reported that Murar Rao Ghorpade's position at Gooty was made very precarious by Haider Ali The Marathas had despatched their able General Parashurampunt Mirajkar to check Haidar Ali's aggression. An Akhbar despatched on the 24th of February 1777 A.C. reports that Muhammad Ali Kamandan, Haidar Ali's general had dislodged his barricades in the vicinity of Dhawai and had advanced beyond Hubli. The relations seems to have become somewhat smoother when, as mentioned in the Akhbar despatched on the 4th of May 1777 A.C., Haidar Ali's pickets in the Sounde, Bidnur region were withdrawn due to Maratha advance. It is reported in the Akhbar of the 9th of October 1779 A.C. that two envoys of Haidar Ali, Gulam Hussain and Abdul Nabi went to Poona to interview the Maratha general and the Peshwa. A great durbar was held at the Palace of the Peshwa, the two envoys were ceremoniously marshalled by Laxuman Rao Raste to the audience hall. The envoys presented two young ones of elephants to the Peshwa who also entertained them with garlands, robes and scents. An Akhbar despatched on the 25th of November 1781 A.C. makes a mention that Haidar Ali was thoroughly routed at Chinnapattan (Madras) by the English and that his son-in-law was wounded. Noor Khan, Haidar's envoy had appeared at Poona and was negotiating through Laxuman Rao Raste to secure the Maratha aid. The Akhbar of the 24th of April 1790 A.C. refers to the matter of the accumulated arrears of tribute to be paid by Tipu. The Poona authorities demanded entire clearance of the balances while the envoys urged to accept as much as was ready money on hand.

Letters are received at Poona regarding the affairs of north India. And the Asaf Juhī reporters secure their gist and transmit it to Hyderabad. An Akhbar of the 28th of July 1787 A.C. reports the movements of Ali Bahadar, the Scindia, the Holkar and the princes of Jaipore and Jodhpur. Ismail Beg first attacked Ali Bahadar and Holkar, but due to some secret understanding Ismail Beg, Jodhpur and Jaipur formed an alliance against the Scindia, and hence Ali Bahadar and Holkar assumed neutrality. Later, as mentioned in the Akhbar of April 1789 A.C. even the Sikhs rise against the Scindia. These affairs throw sufficient light on the mutual jealousies between the Scindia and the Holkar.

The prince at Kolhapur also caused a great annoyance to the Poona authorities. Yesaji Scindia, his general, was endeavouring to cause as much havoc as possible in the Panhala division, and was extorting tributes from people. Manaji Phakade also extended Yesaji Scindia's nefarious activities. Ramachandra Ganesh Kanade was set upon him to arrest these mischiefs. Mention is made of this in numerous Akhbars as for example in the Akhbar dated the 12th of March 1777 A.C.

The most outstanding point frequently referred to in the Akhbar regarding internal affairs is the problem of the inflated arrears of the army under Haripunt Phadke. Though a brave and a seasoned veteran, Haipunt could not have a forceful hold on the army. Unhappily the arrears of the army created acute dissatisfaction which disorganized the discipline. And matters came to such a pass, as reported in the Akhbar despatched on the 11th of March 1777 A.C., that Sidashiv Dinkar, paymaster of Haipunt's army was rudely assaulted by the soldiers on being obliged to say a nay to the rightful demands of the soldiers. The assaulter was done to death forthwith yet even the paymaster had to succumb to the wounds. Haipunt was incapacitated to lead campaigns. And the Kaibharies had to secure Moroba Dada's confidence and enlist his service as a commander of the army. Akhbar despatched on the 1st March 1777 A.C. reports how Nana Farnavis had deputed Krishna Rao Bailal to win over Moroba Dada. He apparently pretends detachment from mundane affairs but is brought round to accept the command under certain conditions. They being that Raghunath Rao should be properly treated and liberally paid, and the arrears of the army should be cleared. In an Akhbar despatched on the 9th of August 1781 A.C. the date of Sakhram Bapu's demise is mentioned as the 2nd of August 1781 A.C. while Sardesai in one of his 'Riyasats' gives this as the 7th of September 1781 A.C. The relations between the Nizam and the Peshwa seem to be very harmonious during these days. No incident of any significance has occurred that could be reported except a few stray things here and there. In an Akhbar dated the 26th of March 1777 A.C. a mention is made that Mubainzul-Mulk desired to be exempted from the Chouth, the Sardeshmukhi and the Sahotra taxes in his Jagus. In another of the 9th of August 1781 A.C. there is reference to the disturbances caused by the Holkar in Vijapur and Gandapuri Paraganas. The same Akhbar further mentions that Azmatul-daula has advanced to check him. An Akhbar dated the 28th of August 1777 A.C. mentions the facts that the Hazrat Shah Sahib of Aurangabad had sent baskets of grapes as presents to the Peshwa and other dignitaries as usual. The importance of the Peshwa seems to have been recognized even in north India. Mention is made in one of the Akhbars of presents of robes being annually sent by the Maharaj of the Gujarathies. Parbat Singh an envoy of Moin Singh, the Raja of Gadhegot had, as represented in the Akhbars, dated the 4th of August 1787 A.C. sent robes of honour with his envoy.

A thorough study of all the Akhbars is yet to be made. A few of the typical ones are studied for the present. As all the facts reported are, observed by eye-witnesses they have the merit of being first-rate evidence for the reconstruction of history. These Akhbars are as much dispassionate as they should be. They are not the biased views of any traveller or pilgrim. They are the honest work of persons who were paid for the duties rendered and appreciated by their masters.

The Menagerie of the Peshwa—its site and description given in contemporary Records (between A.D. 1778 and 1794)

BY

P. K. GODE, M.A., CURATOR, B. O. R. INSTITUTE, POONA.

IN a note published in the Proceedings⁽¹⁾ in the Bharata Itihasa Samshodhan Mandal, Poona, Sardar G. N. Mujumdar, C.I.E., has identified the place of Peshwa's menagerie (Sikarkhana) in the City of Poona on the strength of a sale-deed of property dated Saka 1700 = A.D. 1778. According to this identification the site of the Peshwa's menagerie is now occupied by (1) the house of one Mr. N. R. Gunjal and (2) the temple of Shi Narahari. Sardar Mujumdar is of opinion that this temple of Narahari is not an ancient one but constructed during the last days of the Peshwa's rule.

In view of the above identification of the site of the Peshwa's menagerie as proved by a document of A.D. 1778 we are curious to know if there are any contemporary descriptions of this menagerie by foreign visitors or other writers of the time. But this problem may better be left to the expert historians of the Peshwa period of the Maratha history. I shall, however, record here the description of the above menagerie as given by Edward Moor⁽²⁾ about A.D. 1790 and recorded by him in his Narrative published in London in A.D. 1794. This description reads as follows:—

1 See Itihasa of the B. I. S. Mandal, Poona, p. 8.—The house of Sardar Mujumdar is situated at present in the Kasla Peth, Poona City, House No. 297. The site of this house was purchased by the grand father of the grand father of Sardar Mujumdar of the name Naro Nilakantha from its owners (1) Shivaji Shunkar and (2) Narasingrao Ballal of the Mandavagane family of Poona. On this site a house was constructed by the forefathers of Sardar Mujumdar viz. Naro Gangadhar and his son Nilkantha Narasana. In the sale deed of this site the boundaries are mentioned as follows:—
“To the East Malhar Ram Bapat, to the South Mairal Narayan Gajpeth, to the West the menagerie (Sikarkhana) of the Sarkar (= Peshwa), beyond that a road, to the North a lane and beyond that Bhatambhat Dhure etc.”

The sale deed is dated Saka 1700, vilambi nama Samvatsara, Asvina, Suddha 1.

"The Peshwa has a menagerie⁽¹⁾ of wild animals but is not a large, nor a very select collection. It consists of a rhinoceros, a lion, several royal tigers, leopards, panthers and other animals of the Cat kind.—An extraordinary camel is by far the most curious creature in the collection. It is of that species called, we believe, the Bactrian Camel,⁽²⁾ and has two humps of such unwieldy dimensions, that when lying down it cannot easily rise from their enormous weight. It is quite white, with very long hair, a characteristic of its species, about its head and neck. The animal is of course a lusus naturæ. It was, as well as the rhinoceros, a present from Scindia. The lynx is a delicate animal, called in India and Persia from its black ears seeha-goosh,⁽³⁾ Sir Charles Malet⁽⁴⁾ has all these animals, with others, represented in clay by a Brahmin,⁽⁵⁾ who has great merit in his modellings⁽⁶⁾:

“शिकारवाना पर्वक्षिशाला शिकारी मृगयुर्मत ॥२१॥

जनावरौ पक्षिण स्युः शिकारे मृगयुर्मतः ॥

हपनाकः पक्षिरक्षा व्याघ्रः शेर इति स्मृतः ।

स्याद्विपणालक्षिन्नवान चित्रातु द्वीपिनामक ॥ २२ ॥

— भोग्यवर्ग

On 22nd July 1754 some expenditure on Peshwa's Sikarkhana is recorded in connection with a “जवादी मांजर” (vide Peshwa Daftar XLII,—No 152, p. 95)

2 The Bactrian Camel is represented on the reverse of the coin of the Indo Greek ruler Kadphises I (about 20 A.D.) In the 12th Century A.D. the Bactrian Camel with two humps was still bred in upper Sind (vide p. 236 of Early History of India by Vincent Smith, Oxford, 1914—J. A. S. B. 1892, p. 224 of Vol. IXI, Part I). Ibid p. 134 footnote 2—Mahabharata mentions asses, Camels and mules in association. Kautilya in his Arthashastra mentions diet for mules, asses, cows, buffaloes, and Camels (vide p. 145 of Sham Sastry's Trans. 1929).

The clay prison of Esarhaddon dated 673—2 B.C. found at Nineveh in 1929 refers to Bactrian Camels in the following line —

3 What is the Persian equivalent of “Seeha-goosh”? The Hindustanee name of lynx (from the Persian) is Sihagosh or “black ear”. It was employed in chase by Akbar (Ain, p. 290) vide pp. 375–376, of Bernier's Travels (Constable, 1891).

4 British Resident at the Poona Court.

5 This Brahmin artist needs to be identified.

6 I wonder if these modellings have been preserved. Moor (pp. 363–364 of Narrative) describes the residence of Malet at Sangam in Poona together with its garden containing a vine yard, apple and peach trees, cypress etc. as also his collection of horses from Arabia and Persia, not to say several elephants used for state visits. He also refers to the extensive markets of Poona and a “long street in which are displayed a great variety of English finery such as looking-glasses, globe lamps etc. The police of Poona were uncommonly well regulated”.

the placid serenity of the camel, and the ferocious confidence of the tiger he is happy in hitting."⁽¹⁾

In connection with the foregoing description of Peshwa's menagerie of C. A. D. 1790 I may note here the interest of Raja Shahu of Satara (A.D. 1682-1749) in curious animals from the Himalayas. In a letter⁽²⁾ addressed by him to the Peshwa he had ordered the following animals for his menagerie.—

(1) Iraqi horse from Lahore, (2) Vanagai and (3) Kasturi Mrga from Shrinagar and (4) Hum paksi.

There are other letters⁽³⁾ in this Peshwa Daftar selection referring to Shahu's interest in several animals and the efforts made by

1 In a Marathi work called Mestaka Pustaka composed between A. D. 1690 and 1700 the Ssharkhana is described as follows—

“सिकारखाना चिन्ते । बाग रिसे वानरे कुन्ते । हरिण
सांवरै चील निरुने । घोरपडा आणि जवादी ॥ ६८ ॥ राही
खबुतरै खुन्गे रावे सारिका बदके गव्हे । दुराज तिनर

(Vide p. 49 of भा. इ. सं. मडक, इतिवृत्त)

When was the “शाहामृग” or Ostrich first introduced into Indian menageries? According to Molesworth the word “शाहामृग” is of Persian origin

2. Letter No 22 of Peshwa Daftar Selection No 7 (A.D. 1707-1720).

3. P. D. No 7 contains the following letters regarding Shahu's interest in animals—

Letter No 25 (1740?)—Amarsing Buntale sent to Shahu Baja, Jure and a pair of dogs

Letter No 27—Nilo Ballal Chitnis sends खावबाज (expert in training खाव birds or quails) together with some quail birds for Shahu Letter No 28—Reference to the purchase of two hawks (बाजजुरे) for Rs. 5000 for king Shahu.

Letter No 15—Order to procure good pups and dogs for Shahu.

Letter No 6—Order to purchase Camels and horses for Shahu

The ‘Hum Paksi’ ordered by Shahu in Letter No 22 is identical with the bird ‘Humma’ celebrated in Iran. There is a belief among the Persians that a person who is to chide by the shadow of this bird becomes a king. A model of this bird in gold and jewellery formed part of Tipu Sultan's throne. In A.D. 1799, Marquess of Wellesley sent this model to the Directors of the East India Company in London for being presented to His Majesty King George III. Since this time it is in the Royal Museum.

It is reported that this bird was presented to Lord Wellesley in A.D. 1840 in honour of all his services to Govt. Friends of Wellesley gave currency to a story that there was a nest of a Humma bird in a banyan tree under which Wellesley used to sit during summer prior to his expedition against Mysore. The shadow of this bird must have touched Wellesley at this time and as a result of this touch he became successful in his Mysore expedition.

For more particulars about this Humma bird vide Itihas Sangraha, Ed. by Parasnis—“Note on Tipu's Throne and other royal emblems,” Vol. III Nov 1910, pp. 10-11. My attention was drawn to this note by Mr. S. N. Senapati, B.A. (Hons.) of the B.O.R. Institute, Poona.

him to procure them from Northern India and elsewhere Shahu was a keen shikari and devoted to all kinds of sports. He tried to get for his menagerie dogs, horses, rare birds, yaks, leopards, musk deer and other rare animals. Rao Bahadur G. S. Saidekar referring to these letters aptly observes —

“A Maratha to the core, the idle years spent in the Mogul Zenana failed to impair his love of an open-air life. Through all these letters breathes an air of simplicity, which he inherited from his illustrious grand-father (Shivaji) and which is a national trait of the Marathas.”

I am inclined to believe that the menagerie of the last Peshwa described by Capt. Edward Moor C. A. D. 1790 owes its inspiration to the Maratha rulers like Shahu and Shivaji though the Peshwas as successors of these early Maratha rulers might have maintained their menagerie perhaps as an ornamental feature of their pomp and glory rather than from a genuine love of animals, so characteristic of king Shahu as we have seen above.

About the lynx (or seeha goosh) noticed by Capt. Edward Moor in the Peshwa's menagerie C. A. D. 1790 at Poona we may record here that Abul Fazl (C. 1590 A. D.) refers to it in his Ain-i-Akbari as follows —

“His Majesty (Akbar) is very fond of using this plucky little animal for hunting purposes. In former time it would attack a hare or fox, but now it kills black buck” (Ain p. 290)

This mode of hunting has been graphically described by Capt. Alexander Hamilton in his New Account of the East Indies (2 Vols.—Edinburgh, 1727) Vol. I, p. 124 as follows —

“Deer, Antelopes, Hares and Foxes are their wild game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature, called by them Shoe loose. It is about the size of Fox, with long pointed Ears like an Hare, and a face like a cat, a grey back and sides, and Belly and Breast white. I believe they are rare for I never saw more than one. When they are taken out to hunt an Horseman carries it behind him hood-winked, and their Deer and Antelopes, being pretty familiar, will not start before horses come very near. He who carries Shoe loose takes off the hood and shows it the game, which with large swift springs, it soon overtakes, and leaping on their Backs, and getting forward to the shoulders, scratches their eyes out and gives the hunters an easy prey.” (1)

1. Little footnote on p. 376 of Bernier's Travels (London, 1891) where the Editor quotes Ain and Alexander Hamilton.

I shall now close this short paper on the Shikar-khama of the Peshwa by inviting the attention of the readers to the interesting description of the "field sports of Aurangzeb" recorded by Bernier in his letter dated 14th December 1664 from Delhi to Monsieur de Meville. In this letter Bernier records the following points about sports.—

- (1) Hunting carried on by Aurangzeb with one lac of his troops in Kashmir
- (2) Uncultivated land reserved as game forest near Agra and Delhi and along both sides of the road leading to Lahore
- (3) Field sports carried on under the supervision of the Grand Master of the Hunt
- (4) Description of the manner in which antelopes are chased with tame leopards
- (5) Mode of hunting the nul-ghaux or grey oxon, which are a species of elk
- (6) Use of Hawks for catching Cranes.
- (7) Hunting the lion with a muskatoon—Killing a lion considered as a favourable omen—Escape of a lion considered as an evil omen—Record of the lion's size etc in the royal archives—(Compare game book of Akbar in which a complete account of game killed was recorded—Jehangir in his Memoirs gives details of his hunting exploits between the age of 12 to 50. He shot 17,167 head of all kinds, including 86 tigers, 41 sparrows, 376 crows (1) and alligators)
- (8) Opium given to the ass which is kept as a prey to attract the lion to be shot.

It would be worthwhile reconstructing the history of Indian field sport from the most ancient times to the present day. For this purpose several monographs would be necessary with a view to recording the available data on the subject in detail. In studying this subject we shall have to observe closely what Indian sport owes to foreign contacts from Greece, Rome, Persia, etc in ancient times and from the Muhammedans and Europeans in medieval and modern times. I would like to know from our Muslim friends what special treatises on hunting are available in Persian or Arabic. There is much scattered material on margiya or Hunting in Sanskrit sources but it needs to be exploited by lovers of the history of Indian sport.

Movements of Nizam Ali and the Marathas

(November, 1773—June, 1774)

BY

KHAN SAHIB PROF. S. H. ASKARI, M.A., B.L. (PATNA COLLEGE).

THERE is no dearth of materials about the career of Nizam Ali Khan Asaf Jah Sami and his relations with the contemporary powers of India, and yet, no one has attempted to write a monograph which one of the greatest and the longest-lived rulers of Hyderabad deserves. From the books written in English, based largely on Maratha and English records, one is apt to form a very unfavourable impression about him, and accept the opinion of those who regard the 'survival of the Nizam as the survival of the weakest'. As regards the relation of Nizam Ali with Raghunath Rao, the historians of the Marathas have painted the former as thoroughly unscrupulous, 'faithless and turbulent',⁽¹⁾ and the latter as 'brave and powerful' but so generous hearted as to allow himself to be completely deceived by 'the feigned pretences' of his enemy, so as to be robbed more than once of his decisive victories. One is likely to become an advocate rather than a judge if one is to rely on any particular version, however accurate and reliable one finds it to be. The present writer feels that sufficient attention has not been paid to the Persian sources and unless what has been written so far, mainly from Maratha point of view, is checked by all other materials, particularly those available in Persian, a full, fair and comprehensive picture cannot be presented. One need not summarily reject the evidence of even the Court historians and apparently apologetic writers for, after due allowance has been made to their partisan spirit, one can get out of them many facts and details which may not be available elsewhere. Hyderabad has got many rich collections of Persian Mss and the State archives may yield much valuable information to those interested in the subject. There are at least three Persian Mss⁽²⁾ in O. P. L., Patna, relating to the 18th century history of the Nizams. An attempt has been made, in the following lines, to place before the readers the relevant contents,⁽³⁾ specially of the smallest among them, entitled Waka-i-Iqbal, written by an eye-witness Qazi Faizul Haque of Parganah Pipari in Aurangabad, at the instance of Samsamulmulk, a minister of Nizam Ali, about the military transactions and movements of the latter, and his relations with Raghunath Rao and the League of the Barbhais, during the short period of about 7 or 8 months from 22nd Shaaban 1188 or November 1773 to Rabi II 1189 or June 1774.

Raghunath Rao, while a prisoner of his nephew, Narayan Rao, intrigued⁽¹⁾ with the 'power seeking' people and having secured the murder of the Peshwa took the reins of authority in his own hands. He was unwise and shortsighted enough to become hostile to the Nizam, and having marched at the head of an immense horde from Poona, he reached the borders of the Nizam's territory and began to create trouble. The Nizam had to leave Hyderabad, on the 22nd of Shaban and encamp, on the 24th, at Mukha,⁽²⁾ 14 kos from the city. Here he was joined by Ruknud dowlah⁽³⁾ who had hastened back from his Berar expedition.⁽⁴⁾ The Nizam's army, 25000 strong, was arranged in the following order —

Raghunath Rao, having marched through the village of Khanapur⁽⁶⁾ and ravaged the territories on the way, arrived and encamped, 3 kos to the east of the Bedar fort. Here artillery duel occurred on the 4th and 5th Ramzan⁽⁷⁾ and some of the enemies and three or four men of the Nizam were killed. Raja Bir Bahadur Akkaji Serker arrived at this time and was favoured by the Nizam. Raghunath Rao at first sent a message which was coldly received. Though negotiations continued for about twenty days yet the enemies were all the time engaged in devastating and burning villages and towns and laying violent hands on crowds of people and cattle thronging for protection near the fort. Yamin-ud-dowla, the keeper of the fort, was busy, night and day, in guarding it and throwing shots on the enemies. On the 9th⁽¹⁾ of the same month R. Rao moved away from the eastern side of the fort and fell back on Khanapur. His repeated attacks on the Nizam's vanguard, which was led by Sabit Jung, were invariably repelled by the swivel gunners and archers of the latter. At last the overtures⁽²⁾ for peace were accepted by the Nizam who sent R. Dowla, on the 23rd, for the settlement of terms. The minister was well received⁽³⁾ and given an elephant, a horse and a robe, and an interview between the Nizam and R. Rao was arranged, on the following day, at a place midway⁽⁴⁾ between the two camps. The Nizam was taken by Raghunath Rao to his own tent and was requested to take his meal⁽⁵⁾ there. Having accepted the offer of a rich robe, two elephants, and two horses, the Nizam returned to his camp. He then sent for the Begams and the baggage from within the fort and sent robes of honour for Raghunath Rao.

Two days after this he proceeded toward Gulbarga where he arrived on the 26th of the following month. On his way thither he halted at Honnabad,⁽⁶⁾ on the 6th of Shawwal, and on the 15th, he graced the house of Rao Rambha with a visit. On the 17th he reverently received the royal robe, sent for him by Shah Alam. While at Honnabad he conferred the Mahal of Akeli as a Tuayul on Rustam Rao Pandhriya, and sent Sidi Amber and Sabit Jung to compel his defiant brother, Yeshwant Rao, to deliver its possession. He paid a visit to the mausoleum of the saint of Gulbarga on the 27th, and the 1st of Ziqad, he sent Khan Jahan, son of Khan Khanan to bring Dalpat Rai, son of Dhar Rai Mahatao, his uncle, who came and was favoured.

While the Nizam was enjoying the sights of Gulbarga news arrived that Raghunath who was 'inherently perfidious and treacherous, wicked and mischeivous' had, on his return from

1. A severe engagement appears to have taken place on this date. When N. A. learnt that his vanguard had been attacked by R. Rao, he rode out on an elephant and sent Amir Begard Bahadur Khan to reinforce Sabit Jung.

2. When R. Rao fell against the men of N. A. he ordered his people to ravage the neighbourhood of the city (H). A large number of people fled into hills and deserts for refuge. There was a great panic. The author of A. N. while paying for victory had a vision which foretold ultimate triumph. When R. R. failed to get an upper hand he opened negotiations for peace through Dhunda Kam and expressed a desire to see R. D. to settle terms of peace with him. A critical study of the position of A. N. leads one to think that the Nizam was at a disadvantage and he was fortunate that his enemy being probably pressed by some more urgent affairs moved away at a time to accommodate with him.

Bedar, broken his pledges, and after raising commotion in the territory of Walatabai⁽¹⁾ was moving towards Balhar⁽²⁾ On the 17th of Ziqad the Nizam set out towards Kalachabutra, reached Bhakalwar, on the bank of Kakna, and halted at Malkher on the 1st of Mohurram. It was at about this time that a force of Mudhoji Bhonsle suffered an ignominious defeat at the hands of Nizam's men. Mudhoji and Sabaji, the sons of Raghoji, had been quarrelling⁽³⁾ with each other, and R. Dowla had supported the claims of Sabaji. Mudhoji and Darya Bai, the widowed wife of Janoji, had joined Raghunath Rao, but when the latter was returning from Bedar, Mudhoji had chosen to separate himself and return to his own country. He had commissioned his agent, Mahipat Rao⁽⁴⁾ to collect money from the Mahals, on his way to his own Taluka. Mahipat, having marched a distance of ten kos waited, on the 19th, for an opportunity to attack the Nizam's (rear) thinking that the Mughals might not make a move on the day and could be taken unawares. But the Nizam moved on and his vanguard, led by Sabit Jung, Raja Gopal Singh, Padam Singh etc fell upon him so suddenly as to drive him headlong into flight, leaving many dead behind and a large⁽⁵⁾ booty to the victors. After punishing severely all those who had done any damage to the agricultural fields the Nizam marched forward and arrived on the bank of Bhima, near the fort of Inkerpur, on the 16th. Here he was met by the agent of many local zamindars and also those from the other side of the Krishna, from Sholapur and Karkara, who offered their peshkush. Those who had been led away by the enemy came forward to offer their allegiance again.

When the Nizam had reached a place opposite Nangaon, 8 miles from Kalachabutra, he learnt that Walatabai was on his way from Raichur⁽⁶⁾ to see him. He sent R. Dowla to receive him and himself advanced and brought his brother on the bank of the same elephant. On the 22nd feasts and festivities were organised in honour of the guest and the latter, after being loaded

But the Marathas, and Haider Ali had taken possession of much of his territory and had to remain content with Raichur and Adoni (about 30 miles south of Raichur). He pleased N A however by keeping their youngest refractory brother, Mughal Ali Khan interned at Adoni (A N).

5 A N camels, horses and bullocks laden with grains and bronze and copper utensils, cloths and other goods were obtained among the spoils of victory (A N and S N). We are also told that the Nizam's general at first sent word to the Bhonsle's officer not to harass the people and leave the place but being proud of his force he paid no heed and was surprised and put to flight A. with favours, was permitted to return to Imtiyazgarh, alias Adoni,⁽¹⁾ on the 6th of the next month. Qiyamud-dowla, the custodian of the fort of Mudgal, his sons, Imteyazud-dowla and Zeyad ud dowla, the keeper of the fort of Golconda, and Quliqah Naik, the Zamindar of Deodurg,⁽²⁾ came from their respective jurisdictions and met the Nizam.

The ill-fated and mischievous Raghunath Rao, on his return from Bedar, had been very busy not only with creating disturbances and levying contribution from the Mahals of the Nizam but also keeping himself vigilant against his other enemies. He had sent Trimbak Rao⁽³⁾ on an expedition against Sabaji Bhonsle. But Trimbak Rao had secretly⁽⁴⁾ espoused the cause of Gopika Bai, the mother of the murdered Narayan Rao, and he also won over Sabaji to his side. The confederates appealed to the Nizam for support. An agent of Raghunath Rao also came to the Nizam who at first felt inclined, in the interest of peace in the country and security to the people, to effect conciliation between the parties through his own mediation. He proceeded, on the 7th Zihijja, towards the fort of Kalyan, and after performing the Id Azha festival at Kolur, he marched to the bank of Kakna, on the 11th. Two days after, he sent Maqbul Ali Khan to bring Raja Ram, the agent of Raghunath Rao, before his presence. Trimbak Rao and friends (including Sabaji) also came to Hiragaon, on the 17th, and halted at a distance of 5 kos from the Nizam's camp. They sent their agent to the Nizam requesting him to support them in destroying the power of Raghunath Rao. As the latter by his faithful action had forfeited all claims for favour, while Trimbak Rao and his colleagues were found to be very earnest, determined, and solicitous, the Nizam had to change his mind and he decided to support the cause of the leaguers. He permitted his Diwan, R. Dowla, and another minister, Wiqui-ud-dowla to go and have a talk with Trimbak Rao. They were received midway between the two camps. Seeing all this Raja Ram returned to report the matter to Raghunath Rao. The minister R. Dowla was ordered, on the 21st to present Trimbak Rao and others and they were allowed to pay another visit to the Nizam on the 23rd, and offer their presents to him. It was at this time that Zafarud-dowla and Zabib Jung arrived and joined the Nizam.

Hearing that Raghunath Rao was moving about Satara, the Nizam marched towards that side and he halted at Ulund (Aland) on the 24th of Zihijja. Haipant Phurkia who had arrived with money, sent by Sakha Ram Pant, from Purandhar, joined Trimbak Rao. The Nizam crossed the Bhima on the 29th and his presence in the neighbourhood so terrified the usurpers of the jagir of Rao Rambha that they could not but evacuate it and offer their allegiance again. On the 22nd of Moharram, 1188, the Nizam arrived at Barampuri and moved, on the following day, to a place 4 kos from Pandharpur. On the 9th he reached Mani,⁽¹⁾ within the jurisdiction of Bhawan Rao Pratinidhi, and he halted at Snamgarh, 4 kos from the bank of the Krishna. Raghunath had been encamped at a distance of 4 kos from the bank of the river, within the territory of Miraj, which he precipitately left, being hotly pursued by Trimbak Rao. The Nizam arrived at Miraj on, the 10th of Moharram and moved further on the following day preceded, at some distance, by Sabaji Bhonsle, who had already been left behind by Trimbak Rao, in his chase of Raghunath Rao. Thus the three forces were marching at some distance from one another on the 12th. In the meanwhile Waman Rao, the Talukdar of Miraj, had cut himself away from Raghunath and joined Trimbak Rao with 3 or 4000 of his men. Hearing that Raghunath was halting at Pandharpur, Trimbak Rao was unwise and reckless⁽²⁾ enough to disregard the advice of his friends, ignore the fact that distance between the three armies left little chance for quick reinforcement, and count unduly on the opportune desertion of many of the wavering adherents of the enemy and he dashed over a distance of 12 kos and faced Raghunath Rao. The latter was clever enough to leave behind those whom he suspected to be lukewarm or disloyal and with his chosen and reliable followers he encountered Trimbak Rao, overwhelmed and captured him. Trimbak's men had become exhausted by the rapidity of the march, in hot summer, over a waterless region. The remnants of his vanquished force elected Haipant Phurkia⁽³⁾ as their leader. It was on the night of the 14th that the Nizam learnt of catastrophe and quickly covering a distance of 12 kos he joined the dissipated soldiery of Trimbak Rao. Raghunath Rao was at a distance of 3 kos. The Nizam found, on his way, at Sangoia, on the 15th, three pieces of the cannon of the enemy, the heaviest of which he ordered to be damaged, while the other two were appropriated to his use.

It was at about this time, when Mahabat Jung, son of Wala tabar, was coming to his uncle,⁽⁴⁾ that the Nizam was overtaken, at Mahuli, within the jagir of Rao Rambhah and compelled to accompany him in his wanderings. Hearing this the Nizam consulted his men and became more determined than ever to push his pursuit of the enemy. He crossed the Bhima on the 17th of Muharram while Raghunath Rao marched from Mahuli towards Ahmednagar. On the 21st, the Nizam halted near the fort of Paerendi and leaving his heavier baggage in the fort he moved on, by way of Kaimala, on the 28th, towards Ahmednagar. He learnt on the way that Gumbak Rao had succumbed to his wounds. Bhivani Ram Patinidhi and many other men at this time left Raghunath Rao and they joined Haipant Phurkia. Very soon the Nizam learnt that Raghunath Rao had turned towards Aurangabad⁽¹⁾ and, therefore, he marched quickly to Nibandhin Ghat, on the 29th, and after halt, on the 1st of Safar, on the bank of river Godavari, near Toki, he moved on and arrived, on the 3rd, in the vicinity of Aurangabad, and pitched his camp at Kalachabutia. Three days before this Raghunath had arrived at village Daboch and pressed the citizens of Aurangabad to pay him large amounts of money. Munrud-dowla, who was in charge of the city, having strengthened his defences stood ready for battle when the approach of the Nizam compelled Raghunath Rao to move away towards Enakalthana and to dismiss the dependents of Mahabat Jung. The enemy passed through Pipari, the village home of the author of W. I., and moved on towards Burhanpur. The Nizam encamped at Muhammadibagh and on the 6th of Safar entered the city through its Delhi-Gate.

Soon, however, he had to leave Burhanpur and moving through the town of Pulmes, on the 9th, he passed on to Chukabala. Here he learnt of the birth of a son to the murdered Peshwa, N. Rao, who was named Sawai Madho Narain. Passing through Silverkama, the Nizam reached the bank of Kelna, on the 13th, and crossed it at Nazarghat. From here he directed Zafarud dowla and Sabaji B. to advance ahead of him. It was at this time that Kishan Rao Ballal, the agent of the partisans of Madho Narain, came from Poona and joined the Nizam. He moved further, on the 30th, to Fardapur. Raghunath Rao was still reported to have 25000 under him but his men were tired of incessant marching and many having deserted him came to seek the forgiveness of the Nizam on the 19th at village Changdevi, 14 kos from Burhanpur. But Md. Yusuf and Sumer Singh Hazari, the latter having one thousand horse besides 5000 soldiers under him, still remained attached to Raghunath Rao and accompanied him in his wanderings on the other side of the Narbada. Raghunath Rao was, however, deserted by Madhoji.

Bhosale The Nizam's camp was pitched on, Wednesday, the 22nd Safar at Ahubagh, on this side of river Tapti. A council was held here and it was decided that the forces of Haripant Phulkar should advance further under the leadership of Balwant Rao in pursuit of Raghunath Rao while Sabaji B. was to send his Dewan, Bhawan Rao Kalia, after Madhaji B. and the Nizam was to stop his further progress for the time being.

One reason of this was the news that Raghunath Rao had succeeded in enlisting the support of Ahalya Bai, the wife of Holkar, and the Sindhia and he had taken refuge at Indore. On the 9th of Rabi I the Nizam learnt that Bhawan Rao was very near Madhaji Bhonsle. Soon the Bhonsle affairs took a new turn. At the time Timbak Rao had been joined by Sabaji B., Daria Bai, had also separated herself from Madhaji and Timbak Rao, having brought about an accommodation between her and Sabaji, had taken her under his protection. Being pressed by her mutinous followers who demanded their arrears pay, she decided to return to her home but Sabaji Bhonsle apprehending that she might join Madhaji again tried his best to dissuade her from proceeding there. She was however adamant and the quarrel ultimately developed into an attack by the Sabaji on her, on Thursday, 21st Rabi I. Many of her men were killed and undergoing many hardships came with a few of her men to Haripant who befriended her and effected a reconciliation between her and Sabaji Bhonsle.

As the rains had come, the Nizam decided to stay at Aurangabad. He moved on the 24th and arrived at Anturbauli while Hari Pandit and Sabaji stayed on at Burhanpur. At the time of his departure the Nizam honoured each of these two chiefs with a visit to their respective camps, and accepted their Peshkash of robes, jewels, horses and elephants. He proceeded further amidst heavy downpour of rains and on the 6th Rabi II he passed through Surabla Ghat and encamped at Anbarapur. Kishan Rao Ballal was directed to proceed from this place towards Poona to settle certain transactions with the officials of the infant Peshwa. Maqbul Ali Khan and Sidi Fajhad returned after ravaging it and joined the Nizam. Sharfud-dowla and Dawar Jung were ordered to return to their respective jurisdictions. When the camp was pitched on the bank of a Nala at a distance of $14\frac{1}{2}$ kos there was such a heavy downpour and so sudden a flood came that many of the men and cattle of the Nizam were carried off by the water. While the Nizam hastily moved on to the other side of the Nala his omrah had to leave their tents behind and to pass a sleepless night without food. Next morning the flood subsided.

In the meantime Hari Pandit and Sabaji had decided to return to their headquarters. The Nizam also got the cheering news that Raghunath Rao, having repented of his bad deeds had liberated Mahabat Jung and allowed him to proceed towards his uncle. The Nizam passed through Balhar and Ladsangoi and arrived, on the 19th of Rabi II, near Auiangabad and pitched his camp at the tank of M. Jiswant Singh of Aurangzeb's days. He finally entered the city in the morning of Thursday, the 20th of Rabi II, 1188 or 30th June 1774. On the 26th Mahabat Jung arrived and met the Nizam. There was a shortage of food-grain in the city but the Nizam ordered the grain-sellers to charge only moderate prices for their goods.

It was not till the end of Shawwal that the Nizam again set out for punishing Raghunath Rao who had crossed the Narbada and the Tapti and was creating disturbances in Khandesh. After chastising him the Nizam left Zabir Jung to pursue the enemy further and himself returned to Burhanpur after passing through Sultanpur, Nazarbagh and Phalner. Zabir Jung returned after sometime. The Nizam had to leave for Nagpur in order to settle certain transactions arising from the quarrels of Subaji and Madhoji (Muharram 1189).

برٹش میوزیم میں اس کا جو مخطوطہ Add. 26, 258 میں محفوظ ہے اس کے پہلے مقالہ میں بھی میر عالم کا نام مصنف کی حیثیت سے آتا ہے لیکن دوسرے مقالہ (مخطوطہ نمبری Add. 26, 259) (کی ابتداء میں ایک) عبارت درج ہے جو مطبوعہ نسخہ میں نہیں۔ اس عبارت میں محمد ابوتراب بن احمد الرضوی اپنے آپ کو کتاب کا اصلی مصنف ظاہر کرتا ہے اور لکھتا ہے :-
 ”پہلے مقالہ کی تکمیل کے بعد جس کے مقدمہ کو میر عالم کے نام سے زینت دی گئی ہے، اب دوسرا مقالہ شروع کیا جاتا ہے۔“

مطبوعہ حقیقۃ العالم کی جلد دوم کے صفحات ۳۸۹ - ۳۹۰ میں جہاں میر عالم کا ذکر حاضر متکلم ”ایں خیر خواہ دولت“ کی حیثیت سے ہوا، اور اس کے مخطوطے کے اوراق ۳۲۲ - ۳۲۵ پر ان کے لیے ضماور واحد غائب استعمال کیے گئے ہیں۔

حقیقۃ العالم کا یہی مخطوطہ ”اے ہسٹری آف دی مریناز“ کے مصنف گرانڈ ڈف کے باغذول میں رہا ہے، چنانچہ وہ لکھتے ہیں۔

”حقیقۃ العالم: یہ فارسی مخطوطہ جس کا ذکر میں یہاں پہلی بار کر رہا ہوں نظام الملک اور ان کے جانشینوں کی ایک ضخیم تالیف ہے۔ یہ ایک حالیہ قابلِ اعتماد تصنیف ہے۔ یہ محمد ابوتراب کی تصنیف ہے اور نظام علی خاں کے مشہور فریز میر عالم کے نام معنون کی گئی ہے اس کتاب کے میرے پاس دو نسخے تھے۔ جن میں سے ایک مشرولیم ارکن نے مجھے متعارفایت کیا تھا۔“

یہاں اس کا تذکرہ دجچی سے خالی نہ ہو گا کہ اس مخطوطے کو حیدرآباد
 لائبریری رسل نے اسلامیہ میں ولیم ارکن کو لکھ کر ہدیہ دیا تھا
 انڈیا آفس میں اس کا ایک اور نسخہ ہے (مخطوطہ نمبر 485)۔
 اس کے پہلے صفحے کی ابتدا ہی میں ابو تراب بن سید احمد الرضوی نے اپنے
 آپ کو کتاب کا مہل مصنف بتایا ہے۔ فہرست نگار کا بیان ہے :-
 ”میر ابو تراب بن سید احمد الرضوی لکھتا ہے کہ وہ میر اکبر علیجاں سکندر جاہ کے حکم پر سلاطین قطب شاہیہ (جنہوں نے اس ملک پر دو سو سال سے زیادہ فرماں روائی کی ہے) کی تاریخ لکھنے پر مامور ہوا۔
 اس نے ”تاریخ قطب شاہی“ اور دوسری تاریخوں کی مدد سے ایک
 تصنیف کی جس کا نام ”قطب نمائے عالم“ رکھا۔ اس کا سنہ تصنیف ۱۲۱۱ھ (۱۷۹۶ء) ہے۔“

اس بیان کے متعلق میر عالم کے سوانح نگار لکھتے ہیں :-
 ”بہر چند ہم نے تلاش کی لیکن ہم اس کا پتہ لگانے میں قاصر رہے۔
 کہ اس کتاب کو میر ابو تراب نے سکندر جاہ کے حکم پر لکھا اور قطب نمائے عالم نام رکھا۔“

حقیقۃ العالم کا ایک اور نسخہ نواب سالار جنگ بہادر کے
 تہ خانہ میں موجود ہے۔ برٹش میوزیم کے نسخے کی طرح اس نسخے کے

۴۲۰
 سرے مقالے کی تمہید میں ابتراب اپنے آپ کو مصنف ظاہر کرتا
 ہے۔ لکھا ہے:-

 حدیقۃ العالم کے مصنف کے بارے میں ایک اور خیال

بھی ظاہر کیا گیا ہے، نواب سالار جنگ اول کے سوانح نگار نواب
 عماد الملک سید حسین بلگرامی کا بیان ہے :-

”اور ایک تاریخی کتاب مسمیٰ حقیقۃ العالم ان (میر عالم) کے نام سے منسوب ہے، اور اسے مرزا عبداللطیف شوستری نے
 تصنیف کیا ہے“ اور ”مرزا عبداللطیف میر عالم کے گہرے دوست تھے۔“

صاحب میر عالم نے اس بیان کی اس طرح تردید کی ہے کہ
 نواب صاحب کا بیان بے سند ہے۔ عبداللطیف شوستری میر عالم کے
 دوست نہیں بلکہ چچا زاد بھائی تھے انھوں نے ”تحفۃ العالم“ کے نام سے
 ایک سفر نامہ لکھا تھا۔ ممکن ہے کہ اسی کو حقیقۃ العالم سمجھ لیا گیا ہو
 یا ممکن ہے کہ حقیقۃ العالم کو عبداللطیف کی تصنیف باور کرنے میں اس
 جہ سے غلطی ہوئی ہو کہ حقیقۃ العالم کا مستند اول نسخہ مطبع سیدی میں
 مالک مطبع سید عبداللطیف کے اہتمام سے طبع و شائع ہوا جو شوستری یا
 بلکہ شیرازی ہیں۔ نواب صاحب مرحوم کا خیال ان ہی عبداللطیف
 کی طرف مبادرت کر گیا ہو۔“

حقیقۃ العالم کے میر عالم کی تصنیف نہ ہونے کی ایک اور دلی
 شہادت یہ بھی ہے کہ اگر یہ میر عالم ہی کی تصنیف ہوتی تو ان تاریخی
 واقعات کی ان میں تفصیل

تعلق رہا ہے، لیکن ہم دیکھتے ہیں کہ حقیقۃ العالم میں تنزک اصفیہ

۱۵-۱۶۔ مصنفہ نواب عماد الملک سید حسین بلگرامی، مترجمہ سید محمد حسن فتح نواز جنگ مطبع ریاست

جو اسی عہد میں تصنیف ہوئی ہے کچھ بھی زیادہ معلومات نہیں ہیں۔
پس بیانات بالا سے واضح ہے کہ حلیقۃ العالم میر عالم کی
تصنیف نہیں بلکہ ان کے نام معنون کی گئی ہے اور اس کا اصل
مصنف ”سید محمد مدعو بہ ابوتراب ابن سید احمد الرضوی“ ہے۔

افسوس ہے کہ سید محمد ابوتراب کے حالات پر کسی قسم کی روشنی
نہ حلیقۃ العالم سے پڑتی ہے اور نہ ہم عصر بیانات سے۔

نواب ابوالقاسم میر عالم جن کے نام یہ کتاب معنون کی گئی
ہے عہد نظام علی خاں آصف جاہ ثانی کے مشہور مدبر تھے۔ پہلے
مملکت آصفیہ کی طرف سے کلکتہ میں سفیر مقرر ہوئے۔ اور پھر
نواب نظام علی خاں اور ان کے بعد نواب سکندر جاہ بہادر کے
عہد میں انگریزوں کے اثر سے عہدہ مدارالمہامی کے فرائض انجام
دیتے رہے۔ تالاب میر عالم اور بارہ درہی حیدر آباد میں ان کی شہرہ
تاریخی یادگاریں ہیں۔ شعر و سخن اور علم و ادب کا خاص ذوق رکھتے تھے۔
حلیقۃ العالم کے علاوہ ماہ لقا بانی چند کالیک فارسی سراپا اور ان کے منشیات
ان ہی سے منسوب ہیں۔

میر عالم نے سن ۱۲۳۰ھ میں وفات پائی اور دائرہ میروس میں دفن ہوئے۔
جیسا کہ ہم اوپر بیان کر آئے ہیں۔ حلیقۃ العالم سلاطین قطب شاہیہ
اور سلاطین آصفیہ کی تاریخ ہے۔ اصل میں مصنف صرف سلاطین آصفیہ کی تاریخ
لکھنا چاہتا تھا لیکن چونکہ سلاطین آصفیہ سلاطین قطب شاہیہ کے جانشین
بنے اور وہ مسلمان بھی تھے اس لیے ابتداء میں ان کا حال لکھنا بھی ضروری
سمجھا۔ چنانچہ کتاب کے دو مقالوں میں پہلا مقالہ قطب شاہی سلاطین کیلئے

۴۲۳
مختص کر دیا ہے۔ مقدمہ میں لکھا ہے:-

اس کے بعد مصنف نے کتاب لکے مضامین کا خاکہ پیش
کیا ہے :

”ایں تالیف مسرت توام کہ مسمی است بحدیقۃ العالم
مشتمل است بر دو مقالہ و یک خاتمہ۔ مقالہ اول در بیان احوال ملوک

قطب شاہیہ انار اللہ برہانم و مقالہ دوم در ذکر احوال سلسلہ علیہ آصفیہ
 ادام اللہ ایام و دوہتم و خاتمہ در بیان محکمہ از احوال مولف ^{علیہ}۔
 مطبوعہ نسخے میں جلد اول مقالہ اول پر جلد دوم مقالہ دوم پر
 مشتمل ہے۔ برٹش میوزیم، انڈیا آفس اور نواب سالار جنگ کے مخطوطوں
 کا بھی یہی حال ہے۔ خاتمہ جو مولف کے حالات پر لکھا جانے والا تھا
 دونوں میں موجود نہیں۔ نہ مطبوعہ نسخے میں نہ مخطوطوں میں۔

مقالہ اول کی تفصیل یہ دی ہے :-

”مقالہ اول در بیان احوال عظمت اشتمال سلاطین قطب شاہیہ
 رضوان اللہ علیہم کہ قریب دو صد سال در ملکات تلنگ کوہ سلطنت
 و فرماں روائی نواختہ و علم دین و داد دیں سر زمین مینو سواد افرختہ اند منتخب از تاریخ قطب شاہی و غیرہ تواریخ معتبرہ۔“
 ”تاریخ قطب شاہی“ سے تاریخ سلطان محمد قطب شاہی مراد ہے۔

مصنف نظام الدین احمد شیرازی منتخب اللباب خانی حال اور
 آثار الامراء اور تواریخ نعمت خان عالی ہیں۔ سرخم قطب شاہی
 تاریخ سلطان محمد قطب شاہی اگرچہ خود بھی کسی اور مخم قطب شاہی
 تاریخ کا خلاصہ ہے، جواب ناپید ہے اور جس کے مصنف کا بھی کوئی پتہ
 نہیں۔ لیکن یہ اس خاندان کی موجودا ولین تاریخ ہے۔ اسی کی ہم عصر اور رد
 تاریخیں بھی ہیں۔ ایک منظوم تاریخ قطب شاہیہ مصنف ہیرالال خوش دل

اور دوسرے مآثر محمودی قطب شاہی تالیف عبداللہ نیشاپوری۔ علاوہ
نظام الدین شیرازی نے حدیقۃ السلاطین قطب شاہی لکھ کر تاریخ سلطان
محمد قطب شاہی کا تکملہ باذیل مہیا کیا ہے اور یہ سلطان عبداللہ قطب شاہ
کے عہد کی تاریخ ہے۔ سلطان ابو احسن قطب شاہ کے عہد پر بھی ایک
تاریخ صائق السلاطین کے نام سے علی بن طیفور نے لکھی تھی، اس کا صرف
ابک ہی نسخہ نواب سالار جنگ بہادر کے کتب خانہ میں محفوظ ہے۔

سلاطین قطب شاہیہ کے ہم عصر ہندوستان کے اور مورخوں نے
بھی مختلف شاہی خاندانوں کے تحت تاریخیں لکھی ہیں۔ ان میں ابوالقاسم
فرشتہ کی تاریخ ”گلشن ابراہیمی“ ابراہیم عادل شاہ دوم کے عہد میں
اور علی بن عبدالعزیز طباطبائی کی تاریخ ”برہان مآثر“ برہان نظام شاہ
والی احمد نگر کے عہد میں لکھی گئی ہے۔ دکن کی سلطنتوں کے آپس کے
تعلقات اور آپس کی لڑائیوں کی وجہ سے ان تاریخوں میں سلاطین
قطب شاہیہ کا بھی تفصیلی حال موجود ہے۔ بعد کے عہد میں معصل
تاریخوں میں لباب الالباب وغیرہ میں اس خاندان کے آخری دور
کے تفصیلی واقعات موجود ہیں۔

حدیقۃ العالم کا مصنف ان تاریخوں میں سے صرف تاریخ سلطان
محمد قطب شاہی، تاریخ فرشتہ اور حدیقۃ السلاطین سے واقف ہے۔ وہ کبھی ناموں
کی تصریح کے ساتھ اور بعض وقت بغیر نام لیے ان کے مضامین درج کرتا ہے
اور ان کے بیانات کو خلاصہ کرنے کی کوشش کی ہے۔ سلطان ابو احسن
کے عہد کے واقعات حدائق السلاطین سے نہیں لیے گئے ہیں بلکہ تمام تر
بغیر حوالہ دربار مغلہ کے مورخوں سے نقل کر لیے گئے ہیں۔

جیسا کہ ہم بتا چکے ہیں تاریخ سلطان محمد قطب شاہی سلامین قطب شاہیہ

اسرار و تاریخ پر یہ سب ساری بہ پرانی تاریخیں ہیں ان میں سے بیشتر کا ماخذ ہی تاریخ رہی ہے۔ لیکن حقیقتہً عالم کے مصنف نے یہ تاریخ جزوی رد و بدل کے ساتھ تقریباً پوری کی پوری نقل کر لی ہے۔ بعض مقامات پر تاریخ فرشتہ سے بھی استفادہ کیا گیا ہے اور اختلافی بیانات نقل کر دیئے ہیں۔ لیکن تحقیق واقعہ کی نسبت کوئی بحث نہیں کی ہے۔

تاریخ سلطان محمد قطب شاہی اور حقیقتہً عالم کا تفصیلی اور تفصیلی مطالعہ حسب ذیل ہے:-

۲۔ مضامین عام طور پر فظی رد و بدل اور خلاصہ کی صورت میں نقل ہوئے ہیں۔ اور بعض جگہ لفظ لفظ۔

۴۔ صدر جہاں کی تصنیف مرغوب القلوب سے جو بیانات تاریخ قطب شاہی میں نقل ہوئے ہیں وہ حقیقتہً عالم میں حذف کر دیئے گئے ہیں۔

۵۔ سلاطین قطب شاہیہ کا فارسی کلام اور میر موسیٰ کے قصائد
حدیقتہ العالم میں اتنے ہی ہیں جتنے کہ تاریخ قطب شاہی میں۔
دوسرے مقالے کے بارے میں صاحب میر عالم کی رائے
ہے :-

حدیقتہ العالم کے قلمی نسخے کو اگر مطبوعہ نسخے کے مقابل رکھ کر
پڑھا جائے تو محض جزوی قلمی اختلافات سے قطع نظر یہ معلوم ہوگا کہ اکثر
مستقل احوال و بیانات کا احاق ہو گیا ہے۔ لیکن قطعی طور پر یہ معلوم
کرنا کہ احاق کس زمانے میں ہوا یا کس نے کیا، مشکل ہے۔ البتہ
بعض احاقات کے مطالعہ سے یہ قیاس ہوتا ہے کہ کسی نے شیر الملک
کے زمانے میں اس کی خوشنودی کے لیے بعض اضافے کر دیے ہیں۔
چنانچہ مطبوعہ نسخے میں شیر جنگ اور درگاہ قلی خاں سالار جنگ کا
احوال صریحی احاق ہے۔ قلمی نسخے میں اس کا ذکر نہیں ہے۔
اس کے علاوہ احوال مرہٹہ بھی اسی طرح احاق کیا گیا ہے۔

کتاب کا دوسرا مقالہ ٹیپو سلطان کی انگریزوں سے آخری
جنگ پر ختم ہوتا ہے اور سلطان شہید کی شہادت کا ذکر کرتے ہوئے
اس جملہ پر کتاب ختم کر دی ہے۔ ”قصہ کوتاہ تمثیل ایزدی چنان بود چنین شد“

تاریخ دکن ترکی ماخذوں سے

اس

جناب ڈاکٹر حبیب اللہ صاحب، استاد قانون جامعہ عثمانہ

۲۰۰۰

دکن اور ترکوں کے تعلقات تقریباً اتنے ہی قدیم ہیں جتنے کہ
میں مسلمانوں کی حکومت۔ اگرچہ ساحلی علاقوں میں مسلمان عرب
دوسری صدی ہجری ہی میں کافی نمایاں حیثیت اور اثر حاصل کر چکے
تھے۔ لیکن دکن کے وسطی حصے میں مسلمانوں کو پہنچتے پہنچتے چھ صدیاں
لگ گئیں۔ بہر حال جب ترکی النسل علاء الدین خلجی نے ادھر کا رخ
کیا تو اس کے اثرات دور رس نکلے۔

چنانچہ دکن کی زبانوں میں سے "تنگلی" میں "ترکو" اور کنڑی
میں "ترکنو" یعنی ترک کا لفظ آج تک مسلمان کے لیے برتا جاتا ہے
اور عام بول چال ہی نہیں، کتبات اور علمی تالیفات میں بھی یہ
لفظ ملتا ہے۔

لیکن دکنیوں اور رومیوں کے تعلقات جو زیادہ تر معاشی اور

بیاسی تھے، تاریخی مد و جزر سے متاثر ہوئے بغیر نہ رہ سکے۔

۱۸۵۷ء میں جب مغلیہ سلطنت کے انگریز کارندوں کے مبینہ ظلم و ستم کے خلاف ایک ہندوستان گیر شورش شروع ہوئی اور قریب تھا کہ ان خود ساختہ کارندوں سے نجات مل جائے تو انگلستان سے آنے والی کمک کو ترکوں نے باوجود غیر جانبدار رہنے کے اپنے صوبہ مصر سے گزرنے کی اجازت دیدی۔ اس اجازت اور دیگر سہولتوں کے باعث ترکوں کے حریف ہمسر، مغلوں کا قبل از وقت خاتمہ ہو گیا تھا۔ لیکن یہ چیز نہ اب ترکوں کو یاد دہو گی اور نہ عام طور پر ہم ہندویوں کو انگریزی نظام تعلیم نے ہمارے ماضی اور حال میں ایک بڑی دیوار جایل کر دی تھی۔ لیکن جب ۱۹۱۴ء کی جنگ عظیم میں قدرت نے نامعلوم طور پر ہندی مسلمانوں کے ہاتھوں ترکوں کو شہداء کی منزا اور بدلہ دلا دیا تو ساتھ ہی ہندی مسلمانوں میں تعلیمی حد تک بھی ایک انقلاب ہو گیا خاص کر دکن میں جامعہ عثمانیہ کا قیام اس کا نقطہ آغاز سمجھا جاسکتا ہے تو ترکی شہزادی کا ولی عہد دکن کے حوالہ نکاح میں آنا حیدر آباد اور ترکی میں غیر محسوس طور پر علمی تعلق بڑھنے کا باعث بنا۔ حیدر آباد میں عرصہ سے ترکی زبان سیکھنے کے حنا وسائل موجود تھے۔ ان سے استفادہ ہونے لگا۔ ترکی کی سیاحت کرنے والے حیدر آبادی بھی بڑھنے لگے۔ آخر ہماری محاسن و نقائص جامعہ عثمانیہ میں ترکی زبان کی تعلیم کے انتظام کا فیصلہ کر کے اس میں مزید استحکام اور دیر پائی کے آثار پیدا کر دیے ہیں۔

اس کے اثرات تو آئندہ معلوم ہوں گے۔ یہاں مستقبل کے ترکی دا طلبہ تاریخ دکن کو یہ سمجھنا مقصود ہے کہ وہ اپنے موضوع کے متعلق ایک ایسا

ماخذ بھی رکھتے ہیں جس سے اب تک بے اعتنائی برتی جاتی رہی ہے۔
 میں تاریخ کا طالب علم نہیں ہوں۔ ترکی ادبیات پر بھی میری نظر
 بہت کم ہے۔ حیدر آبادی کتب خانوں میں ترکی کتابوں کا کوئی خاص
 ذخیرہ بھی نہیں ملتا ہے۔ میرے خانگی ذخیرہ کتب میں صرف چند درجن
 ترکی کتابیں ہیں۔ ان میں سے تین چار کے کچھ اقتباسات آج بطور نوٹ
 سنائے مقصود ہیں۔

دکن کے حالات ہمیں ترکی زبان میں زیادہ تر عام تاریخوں اور
 سفر ناموں میں ملتے ہیں۔ اشعار اور افسانوں وغیرہ سے اس وقت

یہ حالات مملکت اصفیہ کے متعلق بھی ملتے ہیں، باقی دکن کے
 متعلق بھی جہاں تک عام تاریخوں کا تعلق ہے، ان میں زیادہ تر قدیم
 اور انگریزوں سے پہلے کے حالات کا پتہ چلتا ہے۔

اس سلسلے میں قدیم ترین حالات مجھے فریدوں باب کی نشاۃ ^{الطین}
 میں ملے ہیں۔ سیاسی دستاویزوں اور بین اسلاطین خط و کتابت کا یہ مجموعہ
 دو ضخیم جلدوں میں اب سے کوئی سو سال پہلے چھپا ہے۔ اس میں سلطان
 بایزید کے زمانہ سے کچھ خطوط اور ان کے جوابات ملتے ہیں اور دسویں صدی
 ہجری کے آغاز سے متعلق ہیں۔ یہ کتاب کسی اور صحبت میں تفصیلی تحلیل
 کی محتاج ہے۔

دوسری کتاب سیدی علی رئیس کی مرآت الممالک ہے جس میں
 لکھا ہے کہ کس طرح دسویں صدی ہجری کے نصف دوم میں پر تگالی
 ترک تازیوں کے خلاف ہندی مسلمانوں، خاص کر اہل گجرات کو مدد دینے

کے لیے ترکی بیڑا آیا تھا۔

ایک اور چرائی تاریخ میں جس کے نام کا ورق پھٹ گیا ہے، یہ لکھا ہے کہ طیبہ کی اسلامی ریاست کنطور نے ایک سفارت استانبول بھیجی۔ تختے میں دو ہاتھی بھی تھے جن میں سے ایک راستے میں مر گیا۔ سفیر نے ایک عربی قصیدہ پہنچایا کہ فرنگیوں سے مقابلہ کے لیے مدد درکار ہے مگر ترکوں کو اس زمانے میں اس کی فرصت نہ تھی۔ ہمارا ترکی مورخ اس پر ناک بہوں چڑھاتا ہے کہ بعض اشعار کا وزن درست نہیں تھا۔ لیکن وہ اس قصیدے کو نقل نہیں کرتا جس سے معلوم ہو سکے کہ آیا خود اس ترک سوخ کی عربی دانی اس بارے میں قابل اعتماد کہی جاسکتی ہے۔

ٹیپو سلطان کے حالات ہمیں زیادہ تفصیل سے اور کئی کتابوں میں ملتے ہیں۔ استانبول میں ۱۷۳۲ء میں نے وہ مکان دیکھا ہے جس میں اب تاک میسوری سفارت کے ایک رکن کی قبر محفوظ ہے۔ ترکی میں عام دواج ہے کہ ہر شخص کی قبر پر اس کی پگڑی کی شکل سنگ مرمر میں تراش کر سرہانے نصب کر دیتے ہیں۔ ترکوں کی قبروں پر نو ہزاروں قسم کی پگڑیاں اور اب ہریٹ وغیرہ بھی نظر آتی ہیں۔ لیکن میسوری سفیر کی قبر دیکھتے ہی فوراً محسوس ہو جاتا ہے کہ یہ حرکی نہیں ہندی ہے۔ میرے ایک ہم سفر رشتہ دار نے کہا تھا کہ بوئے کچوری نئی آید۔

اس سفارت کا خلاصہ تاریخ احمد جودت کی جلد سوم (مطبوعہ ۱۳۴۳ء) سے لے کر عرض کیا جاتا ہے۔

بیانات میں کئی بادی النظری غلطیاں بھی ہیں لیکن عمداً ان کی نقل کی جاتی ہے :-

ذی حجہ ۱۲۰۳ھ کے اواخر میں بغداد اور بصرے کے والی کے پاس سے ایک رپورٹ آئی کہ ملائکہ کھبائیت کے شہر پٹن کے حکمران ٹیپو سلطان نے مدینے اور ایچی بھیجے ہیں۔ جو سات غراب (زامی کشتیوں) میں ۲۸ شوال کو بصرہ پہنچے ہیں۔ بصرے سے تین منزل پہلے حسب عادت دو اسرنامی مقام پر اطلاع دینے کے لیے انھوں نے گندھک کی چھ مشعلیں روشن کیں جن کو وہ اہتباب کہتے ہیں۔ ہوا مخالف ہونے سے چنگاریاں ایک کشتی کو لگیں اور اس میں کامان جل گیا۔ جلے ہوئے سامان میں تین تین جڑاؤ بازو بند چنگاں، سورخوج، قلاوہ لی، زیور بھی تھے۔ لیکن ضایع شدہ چیزوں کے بالکل مثل تحفے اور بھی سفیر کے ساتھ موجود ہیں۔ ان لوگوں کا گمان ہے کہ ترکی حکومت کے تین وزیر ہوتے ہیں۔ اس لیے ان تینوں کے لیے بھی تین تین تحفے آئے ہیں۔ مقصد یہ بیان کرتے ہیں کہ خلافت پناہ یعنی سلطان ترکی سے خصوصی رشتہ دوستی پیدا کرنے کے لیے ریاست پٹن کی بندرگاہ منگرور کو مع جملہ آمدنی و اموال نذر میں پیش کریں اور استدعا کریں کہ اس پر قبضہ و تصرف کے لیے ترکی سے ایک والی بھیجا جائے۔ وہ اپنے تاجروں کے لیے بھی مثل فرنگیوں کے تین فی صد محصول درآمد کی استدعا کرتے ہیں۔ نمونے کے طور پر بندوق پستول اور بارہ گھنٹے پانی میں رہنے کے باوجود گیلی نہ ہونے والی بارود بھی ارسال کی گئی ہے۔ بغداد اور صافا کے مزارات انبیاء و اولیاء کے مجاوروں کے لیے بھی تحفے آئے ہیں۔ نجف کے قصبہ صواجر تک دریائے فرات سے ابک نہر لانے کے لیے پچاس ہزار بڑے ربیعے (روپیے) بھیجے گئے ہیں۔ حرمین شریفین میں تعمیر و ترمیم اور رباطوں میں وظائف وغیرہ بھیجا کرنے کی اجازت چاہی گئی

سفر کے ساتھ بیس بیس مور تھے۔ ان میں سے پندرہ تین سفید طوطوں اور
 سرخ مرغوں میں سے تینوں، اور بیس کالے بندروں میں سے پندرہ،
 اور سفید وسیاہ دو ہاتھی راستے میں مر گئے۔ ہاتھی جیسے جانور ساتھ
 لانے کی طبع دو ماہ قبل ہمیں مسقط سے آئی تھی۔ اگرچہ بن الماکہ
 تحفے عادی بات ہیں لیکن اس دفعہ کی ندرت کے باعث اس کا انتظار رہا۔

اس کے بعد مولف نے قطع کلام کر کے واصف افندی
 کے حوالے سے لکھا ہے کہ منگور کا نام تقویم بلدان اور جغرافیہ کی
 کسی کتاب میں نہیں ملتا۔ غالباً یہ منگور کا محرف ہے۔ منگور
 ایک بندرگاہ ہے جو سومات سے مشرق کی طرف ایک مرحلے
 پر واقع ہے۔ حبیب السیر میں اسے بیجانگر کی سرحد میں ہونا
 لکھا ہے۔ اس شہر میں دو مربع فرسخ کا ایک عظیم الشان تہخانہ
 ہے۔ اس کا ہر ضلع دس دس ہاتھ کا اور اونچائی پانچ ہاتھ
 کی ہے۔ اس کی جملہ دیواروں پر دھات کی پلیٹیں جڑی
 ہوئی ہیں۔ اندر چار برآمدے یا دالان ہیں۔ دروازے پر ایک آدمی کی
 مورت ہے جس کی آنکھیں یا قوت کی ہیں اور نہایت کاریگری سے
 بنائی گئی ہے۔ پھر حاشیے پر لکھا ہے کہ ۱۳۳ھ میں خادم آبادی نامی
 شخص نے ہندوستان سے ایران و عرب جا کر جو فارسی سیاحتنامہ
 لکھا ہے اس میں سندھ سے بحری سفر کر کے مسقط آنے اور ملیبار سے مکہ
 جانے کا ذکر ہے (بعض لوگوں کے حوالے سے منگور کو پنجاب کا جزو بھی بتایا ہے)۔

۴۳۴
 پھر اصل قصہ جاری ہوتا ہے کہ چار سفیر تھے جن کے نام سید غلام علی شاہ،
 شاہ نور اللہ خاں، لطف علی خاں، اور جعفر خاں تھے ہیں۔ یہ آستانہ پرچے
 اور ۲۱ ربیع الآخر ۱۱۲۰ کو رئیس الکتاب (چیف سکرٹری) سلیمان فیضی
 افندی سے ملاقات کی۔

ملاقات میں ہندوستان کے عام حالات پر مختصر روشنی ڈالی گئی اور کہا
 کہ وہاں وزیر مطلق کو نظام الملک کہتے ہیں۔ اور غیاث الدین نامی نظام الملک
 کا انتقال اور محمد شاہ کے بعد احمد شاہ کی تخت نشینی سے ہر جگہ طوایف الملوک
 پھیل گئی۔

انگریز فرانسیسی، پرتگالی اور مرہٹہ حملہ آوروں کا کروڑوں روپے
 کی آمدنی کے علاقے پر قبضہ ہو گیا ہے۔ بنگالہ کی آمدنی میں کروڑ رعبیہ
 سالانہ بتائی ہے۔ کرناٹک کی تین کروڑ، سورت و گجرات کی تین کروڑ
 سفیروں نے پھر ٹیپو سلطان کے اپنے سونے اور چاندی کے دو دو کتے
 بھی ملاحظہ میں پیش کیے۔ بڑی اشرفی کے پندرہ اور چھوٹی کے چار رعبے
 ہوتے تھے اور چھوٹے رعبے کے چالیس اور بڑے کے اسی پائے (اُپیسے)
 ان سکوں پر ایک طرف:—

دین احمد درجہاں از فتح حیدر روشنت۔ ضرب پٹن
 سال جلوسہ ۱۱۴۹ ہجری

اور دوسری طرف:—

هو السلطان الوحيد العادل سوم ہمداری سال جلوسہ

لکھا تھا۔

عرض مدعا کی خواہش پر سفیروں نے کہا کہ بصرہ دیکر منگلور سے

اس کا تبادلہ کر لیا جائے پوچھا کہ اس سے شہبندر (قونصل) وکیل یا
 مصلحت نگار مراد ہے؟ تو کہا کہ نہیں، بلکہ بطور اجارہ لینا مطلوب
 ہے اور یہ تبادلہ ارہنی بطور امانت رہیگا آپ جب چاہیں اس
 لے لیں۔ مسافیت، آمدنیاں، صنعتیں، آب و ہوا وغیرہ دریافت
 کی گئی۔ پھر ترکی رئیس الکتاب نے کہا کہ سلطان المعظم کی سلطنت
 اتنی وسیع ہے کہ اس کے جملہ ممالک کا گننا بھی ممکن نہیں۔ اہم
 آپ کے کسی ملک یا بندرگاہ کی حاجت نہیں۔ وہ اپنا ملک جس کو
 چاہے بخش سکتے ہیں اور ایک لمحے میں کسی ادنیٰ کو بادشاہ بنا سکتے ہیں
 بہر حال یہ امور حضور شانہ میں عرض کر دیے جائیں گے۔ آپ کی اور کیا
 خواہش ہے؟ اس پر سفیروں نے کہا کہ مکہ، مدینہ، نجف، کربلا،
 مشہد حضرت علی اور خانقاہ پیر جیلانی پر چاندی کے دروازے
 نصب کرنے، اور وہاں ایک ایک مسافر خانہ اور ایک ایک نوبت خانہ
 بنانے کی اجازت دی جائے اور دیگر یہ کہ اگرچہ ہمارے ہاں بھی
 اچھے کاریگر اور اسلحہ ساز ہیں۔ لیکن اگر دین متین کی تقویت
 کے لیے توپ، خمبرہ (دیم)، تفنگ، گھڑی، شیشہ، ظروف
 چینی اور آئینہ بنانے والے چند کاریگر بھیجے جائیں تو ٹیپو سلطان
 کی مسرت کا باعث ہوگا۔

چونکہ اس اثنا میں روس کا مسئلہ ظہور میں آ گیا تھا۔
 اس لیے ان سفیروں کی مذکورہ ”بے معنی“ باتوں پر توجہ کی کوئی
 ضرورت نہ تھی۔ آخر میں حیدر علی خاں اور فتح علی خاں ٹیپو سلطان
 کے عام حالات چند صفحوں میں ہیں اور یہ پورا ذکر گیارہ صفحوں

ایک اور مولف قارئین زادہ سلیمان شکری ہیں۔ انھوں نے "سیاحات الکبریٰ" کے غلط نام سے ۱۹۷۷ء میں لینن گراڈ میں (جو اس وقت تک پیٹر بورگ کہلاتا تھا) اپنا سفرنامہ شایع کیا۔ انھوں نے قریب قریب پوری پُرانی دُنیا کی سیر کی ہے۔ فوٹو اور ڈاڑھی سے نوجوان عالم معلوم ہوتے ہیں۔ قدم قدم پر ماشاء اللہ اللہ کا اعادہ کرتے ہیں۔ مگر زبان بڑی پھکڑ ہے اور یہ امتیاز نہیں کہ کس کو کس وقت کن الفاظ سے یاد کریں۔ مولف کو سلطان عبدالحمید خاں ثانی سے بڑی عقیدت نظر آتی ہے۔

لا عبد القیوم مرحوم سے بمبئی میں ملاقات کرنے اور انہیں کے ترغیب دلانے پر یہ ذی قعدہ ۱۳۲۷ھ کے اواخر میں حیدرآباد پہنچے اور بہ ظاہر دس ماہ قیام کیا۔ شروع میں شہر حیدرآباد کا عام تذکرہ لکھا تو توصیف کے ساتھ کیا ہے۔ حسین ساگر، میر عالم اور میر جملہ کے مالابو باغ عام، گولکنڈہ وغیرہ کی بھی سیر کی ہے لکھا ہے کہ کتب خانہ مصفیہ میں اسی ہزار کتابیں تھیں۔ بلدہ و ضلاع کی صنعتوں کا بھی ذکر ہے پھر مرحوم اعلیٰ حضرت کی بہن "بیکم بی بی صاحبہ" کی مظفر جنگ سے شادی اور اس محفل میں خود کے بھی شریک ہونے کا ذکر اور تفصیلات تقریب میں لکھا ہے کہ دو کھا کی عمر چالیس سال کی اور دولہن کی پینتالیس سال کی تھی۔ دولہن کی اس بڑی عمر کی وجہ یہ لکھی ہے کہ کسی کو جو رات نہ تھی کہ مرحوم اعلیٰ حضرت کو یاد دلائیں۔ اس پر خوب بدزبانی کی ہے۔

ہمیں (۴۵) اتھی، ایک لاکھ گھوڑے؛ دیرمہ لاکھ اشرفیاں، اٹھارہ ہزار
من بنڈی کا کچرا (عربہ قحیر دسی ۹) (۴۵) من مچھر کی چربی درج کی گئی تھی
مچھر کی چربی شاہی بیگمات کے سلسلے میں بہت قدیم چیز ہے۔ البتہ
دوسری چیز بنڈی کا کچرا اعلیٰ حضرت کی جدت طبع قرار دے کر اس پر
خوب مصحفیہ لکھا گیا ہے۔

ترکی اور روس کی جنگ کے زمانے میں ممبئی کے ترکی قونصل
حسین حبیب کا چندہ جمع کرنا اور نطلب کرنا بڑی تفصیل سے لکھ کر گالیوں
کا ذخیرہ ختم کر دیا ہے۔

پھر سنگریہ بکھنے کی بڑی تفصیل ہے۔ ملا عبد القیوم کے بچوں یعنی
عبدالباسط، عبدالمنعم اور عبدالرحمن صاحبوں کے ہمراہ حسن الزماں حسنا
کے مکان جانے اور ان (۷۸) فوجی جمیعتوں کو دیکھنے کا ذکر ہے جو گزریں۔
فیل نشان، شتر سوار، جوانان کو تو الی، جمیعت بے قاعدہ، جمیعت باقاعدہ
سدی کار سالہ، اسپیرل سر ویس، سنٹ و سکند لانسبز، جمعداران
سندوزی، جمعداران ہمدوی، جمیعت سندھیان، جمیعت سکھان،
غرض ہر ایک کا مفصل ذکر اور اس کے افسر اعلیٰ یا جمعداران کا نام
لکھا ہے۔

لنگر کے آغاز کی تاریخ کے بعد حیدر آباد کے جغرافیہ حالات، امرائے
عظام کی آمدنیاں وغیرہ لکھ کر ہر ایک کے متعلق ایک قصہ لکھا ہے جو ممکن
ہے کہ چار مینار پر کسی سے سنا ہو۔ چنانچہ لکھا ہے کہ کرنل بارنامی ایک
انگریز قونصل تھا۔ اس نے ایک دن اعلیٰ حضرت سے بہت تعظیم و تکریم
سے ملاقات اور ”جلالت آب“ سے مخاطب کر کے کہا کہ برطانیہ عظمیٰ کی

سلطنت آپ کی بڑی ممنون و متشکر ہے۔ ہندوستان میں موجودہ آپ
 آپ ہی کے اتحاد اور امداد کا نتیجہ ہے۔ اب صرف ایک جھوٹی سی
 تمنا رہ گئی ہے۔ حضور نے فرمایا کہ انگریزوں کی کوئی درخواست ہمارے
 دربار سے رد نہیں کی جاتی۔ اس پر کرنل بار نے کہا کہ ہمارے چھوٹا سا
 حقیر علاقہ ہمیں دید و توہم آپ کو سالانہ ڈھائی ملین روپے خرچ
 دیا کریں گے۔ انگریزوں کو اپنا خرچ گزار بنانے کے خیال سے حضور
 پھول گئے اور بیس ملین آمدنی والا علاقہ ڈھائی ملین کے عوض خوشی
 سے دے دیا۔ اس پر مولف نے حضور نظام کی عقل و قابلیت کو خوب
 صلواتیں سنائی ہیں۔

اس کے بعد مدراس بنگلور وغیرہ کی سیر کا ذکر ہے۔

ایک اور کتاب ”ہندوستان و سوات و فغانستان
 سیاحتنامہ ہسی“ ہے جو احمد حمیدی رئیس الجبہ
 نے استانبول میں سن ۱۲۸۰ھ میں چھاپی ہے۔

حیدرآباد کا ذکر صفحہ (۲۴ و ۲۸) میں ہے۔ علاوہ معمولی
 و سرسری امور کے لکھا ہے کہ سکندر آباد کے کسی انگریز فوجی افسر کا
 سفارتی خط حیدرآباد کے انگریز سفیر کے نام لانے ہی پر کسی اجنبی کو
 حیدرآباد کی سیر کی اجازت ملتی ہے، ورنہ نہیں۔ ایک جملہ لفظ بہ لفظ
 ترجمہ کر کے نقل کرتا ہوں :-

”چونکہ انگریز ایک حد تک حیدرآباد پر ماتہ ڈال چکے ہیں۔
 اس لیے نو ابان حیدرآباد نے اپنی مملکت (۱) کو پوری طرح انگریزی

تصرف میں آجانے سے بچانے کے لیے سکندر آباد سے حیدر آباد جانے کی سڑک کے کنارے شہر کی سیدھ میں حسین ساغر نامی ایک تالاب بنا دیا ہے۔ اس تالاب کا پانی دھوپ میں نیلے آسمانی رنگ کا نظر آتا ہے اور ایک بڑا سفرہ (۹) معلوم ہوتا ہے۔ اگر سکندر آباد سے کوئی فوج حیدر آباد میں داخل ہونا چاہے تو تالاب کا پانی نشیبی میدان میں چھوڑ کر اسے دلدل بنا دیا جاسکتا ہے اور فوجی نقل و حرکت روک دی جاسکتی ہے۔۔۔
